Space of six hours, repelled in the end with the loss of his Crown, and his Kingdom, that he could not take upon him the Government, with the Title of King, it was resolv'd on, that the Title of Lord Protector should be continued and inferred in the Humble Petition and Advice, by which Title he was solemnly Invested, with much more Ceremony than before, on the 26th of June, before a great Assembly of People in Westminster-Hall, where a Fabrick was erected for that purpose, and a Chair of State placed for the Lord Protector, whose Intalment wanted but little of a Regal manner, and though he attain'd not the Crown, yet he had the Scepter, for there were four Emblems of Government presented unto him by Sir Thomas Widdrington the Speaker (who at the delivery of them made an Oration to the Protector, in which he amply delighted upon each of them) a Purple Velvet Robe lined with Ermines, wherewith he was Vested by the Earl of Warwick Commissioner Whitlock, and the Speaker, a large Bible with Bosses and Claps richly Gilt, a Scepter of Gold, and a Sword, which the Speaker girt about him: Thus Attired, while he sat in his Chair under a Canopy of State, holding the Scepter in his Hand, the Herald standing aloft, made a Signal to the Trumpet to sound thrice; after which he was proclaimed Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and then returned to White-Hall in State, having the Sword borne before him by the Earl of Warwick. He was likewise proclaim'd not only in London, and other Parts of England, but also in the chief Cities of Scotland and Ireland. And now he began to take the King upon him in his manner of living, to Govern after a more Monarchical manner, and to model his Family according to the Fashion of a Kings Court; to which end, he had his Yeomen of the Guard in their Livery of Gray-Cloth, with Wets of Black Velvet, of whom Walter Strickland was Captain; his Lord Chamberlain was Sir Gilbert Pickering, the Lord Keeper of the Seal Nathaniel Fiennes; Lambert, who was yet a while not quite out of Favour, was Baron of the Cinque-Ports, Glyn was Lord Chief Justice of England, and Steel (formerly Recorder of London) Lord Chief Baron: Moreover, being thus confirm'd Protector by Authority of his Parliament, and having fortified himself by Alliances abroad (for besides the Leagues with France, Sweden, the United States, and a fair Correspondence with Denmark, he had also upon the coming of Don Francisco de Mello Ambassador, concluded a firm Peace with Portugal;) he began to make it his next care, for the better establishing of himself, and strengthening of his Interest at home, to advance his nearest Friends and Relations, and to match his Children into the noblest Families; his eldest Son Richard he call'd out of the Country, to inure him to a Court life, and an insight into publick Affairs, designing him for Succession in the Protectorate, which the University of Oxford prudently foreseeing (as the Learned were never found backward in complying with the Times, and courting the rising Sun) sent their Agents and their Proctors to him, to elect him their Chancellor, in which Honour he was solemnly Installed at White-Hall: his second, Henry, he created Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of his Son-in-law Fleetwood, whom he recalled from thence, wanting, as he said, his Preference and Council: his two youngest Daughters he match'd, Frances the elder, to Mr. Robert Rich, Grand-Child to the then Earl of Warwick, (though he is said to have aim'd the marrying of her to the Duke of Buckingham, who not long before was come over into England, rather by Toleration than free Permission, and to Cromwell no little displeasure, had predispos'd of himself to the Lord Fairfax his Daughter and Heiress;) Mary the younger to the Lord Falconbridge, the Nuptials for them both being kept with much Festivity and Splendor, both at White-Hall and Hampton-Court.

Scarce was the Mirth of these Solemnities over, when, to allay the Triumphs for the severall Successes of the English in Flanders, here arriv'd the News of the loss of Sir John Reynolds General of the Forces in those parts, who with Col. White and some others, Imbarquing for England, by the way of Goodwin Sands, in a small Vessel, at a Tempestuous Season, contrary to the persuasions of many, (it is unsafe to venture against ill Presage) was cast away with his whole Company. But here was something more than ordinary in this shaly coming over of Reynolds and White, both seeming to prevent the pre-arrival of each other; for whether Reynolds was sent for by Cromwell, or suspected the Intention of White to be some Impeachment against him, his Business probably was to defend himself, in reference to an Imputation of holding Correspondence with the Royalty, because he was prevail'd with by the Duke of Tork, who always lov'd stout men, to give him a meeting between Dunkirk and Mardike; at which Parley, Reynolds was indeed not backward to render his Highness those Honours and Civilities which were due to a Person of his Illustrious Quality. Not many Months before there dyed at Sea, as he was entering into the Sound of Phlomyth, that valiant and expert Sea-man General Robert Blake, not long surviving his notable Exploit at Santa Cruz; the best Eulogium that can be given him, is the true Rehearsal of his Actions; than which, saying that it was his Misfortune to serve an Illegal Power, never were any perform'd at Sea more conducing to the Glory of our English Nation. Also, Vice-Admiral Badly ended his life on Land, whether he was come for the recovery of his Health; and at Jamaica there dyed Lieut. Gen. Brain, Commander in Chief of the Forces there.

A As for Colonel Sexty who died about this time in the Tower; having not long before been taken in a disguise, as one that had had a hand in the business of Sindercomb; his death was not without some suspicion of Poyson.

The laſt Convention having adjourn'd on the 26th of June, met again on the 28th of January following; and in this Seſſion, which differ'd from the other as much as one diſtinct Parliament could poſſibly have done from another, two very obſervable things are to be taken notice of, which gave more diſturbance to Cromwell's not only Ambition, but ſeely, than he with all his Policy and foreſight was aware of; the firſt was the admiſſion of thoſe Members which in the laſt Seſſion were kept out with a high hand, whom ſince the Injuſtice of the act did not refrain from excluding the time before, the conſideration o' his Inter'eſt urg'd him now no leſſe, but rather the more to have excluded them this time alſo; but he was oblig'd to the contrary by his Friends (if at leaſt they were his Friends) of the laſt Convention, who made it one of the Articles in their Humble Petition and Advice, That thoſe perſons who are legally choſen by a free Election of the People to ſerve in Parliament, may not be excluded from doing their Duties, but by conſent of that Houſe whereof they are members. The other was, the Erecting of a new Convocation intended (in Imitation of the Old Conſtitution) for a Houſe of Lords, but they would not venture at firſt to call it by any other name than that of the Other Houſe; It conſiſted partly of ſuch as he took for his eſpecial Favourites, Officers of the Army and others; many of which were pick'd out of the Houſe of Commons to be conſtituted in the Other Houſe, partly of ſeverall of the late excluded Common-wealth-men, and ſuch likewiſe of the Army whom he thought hereby to draw off to his own Party, and about half a ſcore of the old Nobility, (of whom the Earl of Milgrave (who died not long after) was alſo a great man in his Privy Council) nor to mention thoſe Noblemen that were nominated, but refus'd to come. Now in this Contrivance of his, whatever his expectation of it was, he found himſelf very much deceiv'd, ſince by this ſtrong inundation of the late excluded, and the tranſlation of ſeveral of his Friends of the Commons into his Other Houſe, his Inter'eſt there was ſo weakened, that his tranſlating alſo of a few of his Opponents (if he thought to make a counterpoiſe that way) avail'd him little; for Sir Arthur Haſſerig and the reſt of the Ficklers both diſſuading to accept of Cromwell's offer'd Barony, and that by the addition of their own preſence they might ſtrengthen their own Party the more, took their places in the Houſe of Commons, by which means the Commonwealths Faction grew ſo potent, and ſlew ſo high; that the Other Houſe was not ſo much as taken notice of, except in way of Deriſion and Contempt; ſo far were they from being concurr'd with or own'd in any of their Meſſages. Moreover, they began to call in queſtion what was done in the laſt Seſſion, as being invalid without their aſſent: So that the Humble Petition and Advice, which but lately made ſuch a noiſe, was like in a moment to come to nothing. This ſo incens'd the earneſt diſſuader of ſome of the chief of them, takes a Hackney-Coach for haſte, and being come into his Other (or Lords) Houſe, ſends for the Houſe of Commons up to him, and for a Preamble to their diſſolution, ſtanding under a Canopy of State, unfolds his Mind to them in this following Speech; which we have thought remarkable enough to ſet down at large, in regard it plainly diſcovers (as averſe as he ſeem'd from accepting the Kingly Title) his ſtrange perturbation of ſpirit, and how nettled to the quick he was to ſee himſelf croſs'd and curb'd in the tendency and progreſs he made therunto, though by ways a little ſeem'd about, and under ſhew of the Settlement and flouriſhing eſtate of the Nation.

I Had very Comfortable Expectations that God would make the Meeting of the Parliament a Blessing; and, the Lord be my witness, I desire the carrying on the Affairs of the Nation to these Ends. The Blessing which I mean, and which we ever climbed at, was Mercy, Truth, Righteousness, and Peace, which I desire may be Improved.

That which brought me into the Capacity I now stand in, was the Petition and Advice given me by you, (meaning the House of Commons) who in reference to the Ancient Constitution, did draw me to accept of the Place of Protector: There is not a man living can say I fought it, no not a Man nor Woman treading upon English ground; but I Contemplating the sad Condition of these Nations, relieved from an intestine Warr unto a Six or Seven years Peace, I did think the Nations happy therein. But to be Petitioned thereunto, and Advised by you to undertake such a Government, a Burden too heavy for any Creature, and this to be done by the House, that then had the Legislative Capacity, I did look that the same Men that made the Frame, should make it good unto me: I can say in the presence of God, in Comparison of whom we are but like poor creeping Ants upon the Earth, I would have been glad to have lived under my Wood side, to have kept a Flock of Sheep, rather than undertook such a Place of Government as this is; but undertaking it by the Advice and Petition of You, I did look that You that had offered to unto me, should make it good.

I did tell you at a Conference concerning it, That I would not undertake it, unless there might be some other Person that might interpose between Me and the House of Commons, who then had the Power to prevent tumultuary and popular Spirits: and it was Granted

Oliver's Speech at the Dissolution of his last Parliament.

1657.

I should name any other House; and I named it of Men that shall meet you wheresoever A you go, and shake hands with you, and tell you it is not Titles, nor Lords, nor Party, that they value, but a Christian and an English Interest, Men of your own Rank and Quality, who will not only be a Ballance unto you, but to themselves, while you love England and Religion.

Having proceeded upon these Terms, and finding such a Spirit as is too much predominant, every thing being too high or too low, when Vertue, Honesty, Piety, and Justice are Omitted: I thought I had been doing that which was my Duty, and thought it would have satisfied you; but if every thing must be too high or too low, you are not to be satisfied. Again, I would not have accepted of the Government, unless I knew there would B be a just Accord between the Governour and the Governed, unless they would take an Oath to make good what the Parliaments Petition and Advice advised me in; upon that I took one Oath, and they took another Oath upon their part answerable to mine, and did not every one know upon what Condition they swore? God knows, I took it upon Condition expressed in the Government; and I did think we had been upon a Foundation, and upon a Bottom, and thereupon I thought myself bound to take it, and to be advised by the Two Houses of Parliament, we standing unsettled till we were arrived at that; the Consequences would have necessarily been Confusion, if that had not been settled: Yet there are C not constituted Hereditary Lords, nor Hereditary Kings; the Power consisting in the Two Houses and myself: I do not say, that the meaning of your Oath was to you, That were to go against my own Principles, to enter upon another mans Conscience, God will Judge between Me and You: If there had been in you any intention of Settlement, you would have settled upon this Basis, and have offered your Judgment and Opinion.

God is my Witness, I speak it, it is evident to all the World, and people living, that a new business hath been seeking in the Army against this Actual Settlement by your Consent; I do not speak to these Gentlemen or Lords, (pointing to his right hand) whatsoever you will call them, I speak not this to them, but to you; you advised me to run into D this Place, to be in a capacity by your advice; yet instead of owning a thing taken for granted, some must have I know not what; and you have not only disjoynd your selves, but the whole Nation, which is in likelihood of running into more Confusion, in this fifteen or sixteen days that you have sat, than it hath been from the rising of the last Session to this day, through the Intention of devising a Common-wealth again, that some of the People might be the Men that might rule all, and they are endeavouring to engage the Army to carry that thing; and hath that man been true to this Nation, whosoever be he, especially that hath taken an Oath, thus to perjure: These Designs have been upon the Army to break and divide us; I speak this in the presence of some of the Army, that these things E have not been according to God, nor according to Truth (pretend what you will): These things tend to nothing else but the playing of the King of Scots his Game, if I may so call him; and I think myself bound before God to do what I mean to prevent it. That which I told you in the Banqueting-House was true, That there were preparations of Force to invade us; God is my Witness, it hath been Confirmed to me since within a day, that the King of Scots hath an Army at the Water side ready to be shipped for England; I have F it from those who have been Eye-witnesses of it; and while it is doing, there are endeavours from some who are not far from this place, to stir up the people of this Town into a Tumult, what if I said into Rebellion; and I hope I shall make it appear to be no better, if God assist me; it hath been not only your endeavour to pervert the Army while you have been sitting, and to draw them to state the Question about a Commonwealth, but some of you have been lifting of persons by Commission from Charles Stuart, to join with any Insurrection that may be made: And what is like to come upon this (the Enemy being ready to invade us) but even present Blood and Confusion. And if this be so, as I do assign to this Cause, your not assenting to what you did Inwrite me to by the Petition and Advice, as that which might be the Settlement of the Nation, and if this be the end of your sitting, and these be your Carriages, I think it high time that an end be put unto your sitting; And I do declare to you, I do dissolve this Parliament: And let God Judge between Me and You. At which many of the Commons cried, Amen. And so the Parliament was Dissolved.

Thus was he driven from one Inconvenience to another, from the Inconvenience of a Parliament that cross'd him, to the inconvenience of no Parliament at all, whereby he was much straitened for want of those supplies of Money which he expected.

Toward

A Toward the latter end of this year died the Protector's Son-in-law Mr. Robert Rich, and was but little above two Months survived by his Grandfather the Earl of Warwick himself.

The following year, 1658. begins with the News of a Victory at Jamaica (which came by an Express from the Governour on the 8th of April) obtained by a Party of the English the command by Major Richard Stevens, against 500 Spaniards, who under Don Christopher Arnaldo Saffer, having lately landed in that Island, and begun to fortify themselves at a place call'd St. Anne, were fiercely set upon by the English, and forced to fly into the Woods and Mountains; and another Body of Spaniards, consisting of 300, who had fortified themselves at Chavarras, in the North of the Island, were, by the Governour himself Colonel Dailly, driven quite out of their Hold, Don Francisco de Prencia, the Maestro d. l. Cape, with others, taken, many kill'd, and the rest utterly destroyed.

Cromwell had no sooner free'd himself of the danger threaten'd him from his Parliament, but he is presently alarm'd again by his old Enemy the Cavalier, whom yet he had still the Fortune to prevent by his Intelligence; however, he took all Advantages to provide still more and more for Party, in behalf his Security, by making the most of all Plots and Designs whatsoever; and to this purpose he sends in all haste for the Lord Mayor (Tichburn was then the man) and Aldermen of the City, acquaints them with what he had discover'd of the base actions against the Peace of the Commonwealth, Protector, aggravates the danger, recommends to them the setting of the Militia in a tidy hands. C. with the Guards to be doubt and strict Watch to be kept in all parts of the City, whenas most of the principal suspected persons were already secur'd, as Sir William Compton, Brother to the Earl of Northampton, Sir William Clayton, Mr. John Russell, Brother to the Earl of Bedford, and many more, the whole Design being before-hand betray'd, by a Person formerly mention'd upon the same Account, and one Corcoran, a Minister of Bourn in Suffolk, and such others, as had been long employ'd by Cromwell for the same purpose; the Marquess of Ormond, who indeed was the chief Manager of this intended general Rising, for his Majesty's Service, throughout the whole Nation, and had to the end remain'd for a good while conceal'd in England, being narrowly watch'd and search'd for; but he happily obtain'd an Opportunity (by the help of one Dr. Quaterman) of shipping himself away at a Port-Town in Suffolk: among those that had been formerly imprison'd, were Dr. Huet, Minister of St. Gregory's, and Sir Henry Slingsby; which last had been a Prisoner ever since the Rising in the West; yet being a Person who was known to bear no good will to the present Power, he D is charg'd with an Intention of delivering up Hull, merely upon the expressing of his Consent thereunto, to some that were sent to make the Motion to him, and stir up his mind with purpose to betray him; and these were Major Waterhouse, Captain Overton, and Lieutenant Thompson; and committed to the Doctor seems to have been no less hardly dealt with, considering what things were laid to his charge; which had they been true, would certainly never have been so utterly deny'd, at the very moment of his death, by a man of his known Honesty and Integrity: The rest that were taken afterwards were Mr. John Mordant, Brother to the Earl of Peterborough, Mr. Manly a Merchant, Mr. Harigil Baron, Mr. Stapely, Mr. Mansel, M. Woodcock, Mr. Carren, M. Jackson, and one Mallory, who is suspected to have been a Deputy to the rest; of whom, Mr. Mordant, Woodcock, Carren, and divers others, were try'd at a High-Court of Justice, which on the 25 of May was set up under the E Presidentship of Commissioner Life; all hitherto mention'd, except Sir Henry Slingsby, and Dr. Huet, having the good hap to come off with life: Sir Henry, and the Doctor, were the first brought to Trial, and both of them sentenc'd to die as Traytors: The first, upon the bare Testimony of those three men, who had so Treacherously circumvented him, which in vain he pleaded; as also the impossibility, a Prisoner as he was, of performing what he was charg'd with: The other, as a Mute, disowning the Courts Authority, and thereupon denying to plead: The next was Mr. Mordant, who also at first disavow'd the Courts Authority, but was at length prevail'd with to plead, and in the end acquitted onely by one Voice, in that fortunate interim, while Colonel Pride by reason of a Fit of the Stone wherewith he was troubled, had withdrawn himself from the Court, and staid somewhat longer than he intended; the other two being so far favour'd, as to have their Sentence mitigated, were on the 8th of June Beheaded on Tower-Hill: The next that were try'd were Mr. Robert Woodcock, Captain Henry Mallory, and Sir Humphrey Bennet: The first made so handsome and discreet a Defence for himself, that they could find no Accusation upon him, and so were forc'd to acquit him; Mallory, no doubt by precompact, confessed, was condemn'd, and not hang'd: Of the rest that had to do with this High-Court, William Carren was acquitted, Colonel Edward Ashton, and John Butely; the first in Tower-Street, (the other in Cheap-side) were hang'd and quarter'd on the 7th of July: the same day Henry Fryer ready to have been executed in Smithfield, and two dayes after John Summer in Bishopsgate-Street, and Oliver Allen in Grace-Church-Street, had their Reprieves brought them: The same day the two last were Reprieved, Edmund Stacy, his Sentence remitted, was hang'd near the Royal Exchange: In the mean time, G Manly, Baron, and Mansel afore-mention'd, with two others, namely Edmund Seymour, and Guy Carlton, having made their escape, were at the Upper-Bench (as it was then call'd) Indicted of High-Treason, though absent, and out-law'd.

In Flanders Successes came on with a swift Carier; presently after the taking of Mardike Fort, Dunkirk was straightly begirt by the joyn'd Forces of the French and English; the French commanded by the Marshal of Tain, Prince of Quefney; the English by the Lord Lockhart, Ambassador. The Siege of Dunkirk was carried on by the French King, who was constituted General in the room of Sir John Reynolds deceas'd. it were the Key of all Flanders ) the Spaniards resolved to Assay, though with the hazard of a Pitch-field; and to that purpose they assembled together all the Force they could make, amounting to about Seven Thousand Foot, and Nine Thousand Horse, Commanded by Don John himself in person, together with the Duke of York, the Prince of Conde, and the Marquis of Caracene; and drawing down from Furness Fort, were engaged by the Mar-shall of Turcin, and the Count of Schomberg, joining with Lockhart and his English Forces, who making their way (a good part of them) up a Sand-Hill, against the whole power of the Spaniards, were the main Instruments in gaining a clear and eminent Victory over the Spanish Army, most of the Infantry being either slain or taken; and among the taken were divers Officers of the Spanish Nobility, and Persons of high Quality, Seventeen Colours, six great Guns, with the whole Baggage of the Field; the Prince of Conde was unhorsed in the Fight, and Mounted again by his Cousin Bonteville, who was thereby taken Prisoner in the Princes Head: There were slain of the English, Captain Sherwin, and another Captain, five Lieutenants and two Ensigns, with eighty common Soldiers besides three hundred wounded, and some mortally, among whom, Lieutenant Colonel Roger Fenwick, he was reported a stout man, and his loss much bewailed: A day or two before this Battle, the Mar-shall of Hocquincourt (who had caused the important Town of Hesdin, to revolt from the French to the Spanish) was slain as he went out Picqueering upon a Party. No sooner was this Battle ended, but the French and English returned again streich to the Siege of Dunkirk, which the Marquis of Leda Governour thereof (who had been formerly sent Ambassador to the Protector) seeing now more straightly than ever Involved both by Land and Sea, whereby it was reduced to great extremities; he resolved to defend the Town in a bold Sally forth, in which he received his mortal wound: the Governours death, and the report of the Granadoes shot into the Town, wrought to the Towns Surrender, that they were speedily brought to Articles of Surrender, and on the 25th of June marched out with Colours flying; to that the King of France in person, accompanied with the Cardinal Mazarini, took possession of the place, and immediately resigned it up into the hands of General Lockhart, in behalf of the Lord Protector, and the English.

The Sixth of August, Elizabeth the Protectors second Daughter died at Hampton-Court of an A-poplemie in some of the inward parts, which afflicted him very much, because he loved her above all his Children; and that sorrow was increased, by the length of her Sickness, and the grievous Torments she endured: A little before she expired (which was in much pain) the Delirium of her Sickness prompted her to utter many things, which though formerly she thought, she yet durst not express, against the Injustice of many of her Fathers Actions. She was married to one Chyppole, the Son of a private Gentleman of Lincolnshire, of a moderate Fortune; but she could not be contented with being of a Spirit as high, as if she had been born to that Greatness, to which her Fathers Ambition had advanced her. She was of a very generous and obliging Disposition, and very much troubled at her Fathers Austerity, and oppression of the Royal Party, to several of whom she did many good offices. The Grief which the Protector had contracted for her death, was very much augmented by his Trouble, to witness, that the Discontents sprung up amongst many of the Inferiour Officers of the Army, were fomented by Fleetwood and Desborough; the first of whom married his Daughter, and the other his Sister, who with Berry and Cooper Colonels, and Sydenham and Pickering, of the Privy-Councillors, were in a Confederacy against the present Government, in favour of a Common-Wealth. And a while after he fell sick himself of a Terrian Fever, which at first seem'd not to signify much danger, but by degrees it grew upon him: Yet his Imagination was so far transported with Enthusiastick Ravings, that insensible of his own Danger, he affirm'd, That G O D had reserved him to greater Attempts, then ever yet had been performed by him; and that he was assur'd he should not dye of this Sickness. In which Extasie, he was much heightened by Goodwines one of his Chaplains, who openly declared, G O D had heard the Prayers of his Servants for him, and given them his Life, and therefore he perswaded some of his Friends, to keep a kind of private Thanksgiving before hand for his undoubted recovery. This Confidence amused his Physicians so much, that they were less regardful of his Condition. But nevertheless, it was advis'd he should be brought to White-Hall, where with more conveniency then at Hampton-Court, respect might be had to his Health, and the Publick Affairs of the Nation, where he had not bin many days, ere it visibly appeared he had but a few more to live. He had some time before his Sickness appointed a Juncto or Committee of Nine, with whom he privately consulted in the most urgent Affairs of the Government. These were, Fleetwood, Fienes, Desborow, Whalley, Thurlow, Lawrence, Berry, Cooper, and Goffe, which were mixed of both Factions, that is, of that of a Single Person, and that of a Common-Wealth, that he might displease neither, and that he might by that Confidence divert the latter from Designs upon his Power.

Upon Tuesday the 31 of August finding himself in danger, he commanded his Servants, and all other Persons, except Mr. Thurlow, and Dr. Thomas Goodwyne, out of the Room, and declared to them, That in regard he found his Sickness and Weakness increasing, he was resolved to declare his Successor, according to the Power given him, by the late Petition, and Advice; And therefore he desired them to take Notice, that he Named and Declared his Son to succeed him accordingly. They ask'd him, which Son? He Replied, My Son Richard, my eldest Son. Immediately thereupon, there came some Persons into the Room, whereby it happen'd, that nothing further was said at that present. But Mr. Thurlow, and Dr. Goodwyne immediately conferring together, did conceive that the Business was too great and weighty for them alone to bear the Burthen of the Attestation of it; and therefore Resolv'd to take the first Opportunity they could to move

A move him again therein, and to desire him, for that Reason, to call some others, to whom he might communicate his Mind in that matter: But in regard that Relations and others (who perhaps would take it ill to be put out of the Room) were constantly there, they could not all that day, nor the next, gain any opportunity.

But on Thursday, perceiving his Distemper very much to increase, and hourly gain upon him, They resolved not to defer it longer: And thereupon they ask'd him, Whether he remember'd what he had said unto them the Tuesday before? Which he said, he did. They asked him, Whether he continu'd of the same mind or not, touching the Succession of his Son Richard? He answered, That he did. They then told him, it would be requisite he should communicate his Pleasure to some others, and that the Declaration of the Business, was of too great Concernment and Consequence for them alone to undertake, if there should be Opposition; and therefore desired him to send forthwith for some others. He ask'd them for whom he should send? They replied, whom he pleas'd. Then send, said he, for the Committee of Nine: Whereupon they sent a Messenger for hitherto to hitherto them thither, of whom three came immediately, Fienes, Whalley, and Goffe; and these five that were then present, perceiving him still to decline, went to the Bed-side, and one of them asked him, touching what he had declared to Dr. Goodwyne, and Mr. Thurlow. He thereupon said again, That he would have his Son, his Son Richard to succeed him: And to without any more Discourse, they withdrew from the Bed, and left him to his rest. But within few Minutes came in Fleetwood and Desborow, upon the Summons that had been sent them; to whom, the aforesaid five, declared what had passed, and offered somewhat faintly, to move Oliver to the Declaration of his Mind again, which they as faintly refused; but were not much urged to it, they having at their first coming declared themselves satisfied with the Attestation of Five Persons, so well known and esteem'd of them.

Upon Friday (the Third of September, the same memorable Day of the Year, that in 1650, he overcame the Scots at Dunbar, and the Year following at Worcester) at Three of the Clock in the Afternoon he departed this Life.

Thus after so many Hazards in the Field, so many Ambushes laid to have been laid against him at Home, notwithstanding the Multitude of Enemies, that, from all Parties and Interests, whom his violent Pursuit of Greatness had exasperated, conspir'd against his safety; contrary to the real Belief of many men, the ill-bodings of some, and the earnest Wish of others, he died not a violent, but in his Bed a natural Death; and among all the Plots, all the Attempts so much talk'd of, against his Life, he only Fatal Accident that ever lighted home upon his Body, to do him any mischief, was from the unruliness of the Duke of Oldenburgh's Horses, disdainning the Whips, though from him whole Last Three Nations so long patiently lay under, when three or four years before, having a Desire as well to Frolick, as in Earnest, to take the Reins into his own Hands, he was dismounted from his Seat, thrown down and trampled under the Horses Feet, and all batter'd, bruis'd, and weltring in blood, taken up for Dead; The Day of his Death was usher'd in by a Night as Tempestuous, as had been seen in this Age, as if the Elements had been in Combustion at the Flight of a Spirit, which had made to great a Concussion in the Affairs of the World.

He was born in the Town of Huntingdon, and was the Son of a Second Brother of Sir Oliver Cromwell of Huntingdonshire, a Person of Eminent Note in the late Kings time; his Mother was the Daughter of Sir Richard Steward of the Isle of Ely, and his Wife Elizabeth the Daughter of Sir James Boscher, by whom he had three Sons (whereof one dyed young) and four Daughters.

His Family is said to have origin ally deriv'd the Name of Cromwell, from that Great Cromwell, who was Henry the Eighth's Vicar-General over the Spiritualities; their Lineal Descent from one Williams of Glamorganshire, who living Contemporary with this Lord Cromwell, and marrying his Daughter, in gratitude for the Favours he had done him, took his Name upon him, and transfer'd it to his own Posterity. And as for his Qualities, there is no doubt, though his Disimulation, his Ambition, and his many other Vices obscur'd, what was praise-worthy in him; yet there was something of generosity in his Nature, as may be exemplified, in the particular care and regard he had for the Relations of some that had serv'd him faithfully, and dyed in his Service; which one that writ his Life, parallels with the Gratitude of the fore-mention'd Lord Thomas Cromwell, toward Seigneur Frischaud an Italian Merchant, from whom he had receiv'd Civilities.

By his Reputation in Arms, he was courted or feared by most of the Princes in Europe, and the Kings of France and Sweden were enter'd into so strict a League with him, as might have troubled the whole World; but Cardinal Mazarini, the chief Minister of France, held most secret Intelligence and Friendship with him. He was, to give him his due, a man of singular Courage and Resolution, and that attended with a most prosperous Stream of Fortune, which is not always the Concomitant of Valour. He kept the Armies under him in so exact Discipline, that they rather seem'd a Body of well-govern'd Citizens, than Soldiers: Swearing, Profaneness, Drunkenness, Murder, Rapine, Uncleanness, the common Vices of other Soldiers, were not to be found amongst his. His Ambition and desire of Glory, excited him to make Attempts also in other Countreys in pursuance thereof, whereby a great Renown accrue'd to our Nation in all parts of the World. And had he not employ'd that Policy and Sagacity of Parts, which must be confess'd to have been in him, to evil Ends, and by unheard of Impieties Traitorously aspired unto that highest Pitch of Honour which belong'd not to him, usurping his Majesties Government, he might have been worthy of eminent Place and Dignity in it.

The Oath administered to him by Fienes.

Mr. Tho. Clarges made choice of to be sent into Scotland, to acquaint Gen. Monk with Richard's Advancement.

An hour after his death, there met together those of the Privy-Council then in Town, that had been the most zealous Promoters of the Petition and Advice, and best affected to that Government. These were made acquainted by Thurloe, with what passed on Tuesday and Thursday; and also, that Oliver had subscribed a Paper long before his Death, touching the Succession, wherein Fleetwood was declared Successor; And that this Paper having been laid in a Cabinet, known only to Oliver and his Wife, and no Person more, (as was thought) was searched for, but could not be found. They then agreed, to send two of their Number to Fleetwood and Desborow, and to know of them unfeignedly, whether they acquiesced in the Declaration that Oliver had made, touching the Succession of his Son? Acquainting them, that they knew there had been a Paper subscribed by Oliver in his Life-time, to the effect aforesaid: And therefore requested to know of them, whether if hereafter any such Paper should be found or produced, they would notwithstanding submit to the Last Will and Paroll Declaration of Oliver? Whereunto Fleetwood replied, and promised, as in the Presence of GOD, That if any such Paper then were, or should thenceforth be found or produced, yet he would not insist thereon, so far as he cordially acquiesced, as he said, in the Succession of Richard. And thereupon a Council was forthwith summoned, where Finnis and Thurloe gave an Account of Oliver's Appointment of his Successor. And Goodwyn, Whalley, and Goffe were called in, and attested the same upon their Oaths. And being withdrawn, the Council unanimously declared their Satisfaction: Desborow having first stood up, and adjured them all, in the Name of the Living GOD, that if any dissatisfaction remained upon their Spirits, they would freely Declare it; as he professed, he would have done, had any Doubt remain'd with him. This passed; the President and whole Council went at once to congratulate Richard, and condole his Fathers Death.

After the Congratulation, Strickland, Skippin, and some others of the Council, were sent to the City, who appeared very well satisfied with what was done; and the next morning a Proclamation was divulged, subscribed by Chiverton Lord Mayor of London, and as many of the chief Officers of the Army, and Councillours of State, as could be got together; wherein Richard Cromwell was at White-Hall, Charing-Cross, and several other publick Places in London, proclaimed Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, about 4 of the Clock in the Afternoon: After the Proclamation, the Lord Mayor presented his Sword to him, which he presently returned; and after some Ceremonies passed, (the Council, and many Officers of State, and of the Army being present) Nathaniel Finnis, one of the Commissioners of the Great Seal of England, administered an Oath to him in these words:

I Do in the Presence, and by the Name of God Almighty, promise and swear, That to the uttermost of my Power, I will uphold and maintain the true Reformed Protestant Christian Religion in the purity thereof, as it is contained in the Holy Scripture of the Old and New Testament, to the uttermost of my Power and Understanding, and encourage the Profession and Professors of the same. And that to the utmost of my power, I will endeavour, as Chief Magistrate of these Nations, the maintenance and preservation of the Peace and Safety of the Just Rights and Privileges of the People thereof. And that in all things, according to my best Knowledge and Power, I will Govern the People of these Nations according to Law.

Thus far Matters succeeded well; his Brother Henry Cromwell was Chief Governour of Ireland, and a Gentleman was sent to acquaint him with the present posture of Affairs. Of Scotland they had some Doubt; but to endeavour to rectifie all things there, Richard sent that Evening to Mr. Thomas Clarges, (Brother in Law to General Monck) to prevail with him, to go immediately into Scotland, with his Letters to Monck, to know how he stood affected to his Advancement: This Clarges was pitched upon, as one who had great Interest in the General, and had been largely chosen by his procurement, upon the Death of one Rowe, to be Agent for the Armies and Council of Scotland and Ireland, an Employment of good value, whereby he became interested in the Knowledge and Affections of the Officers of all the Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland; for the Regiments of that of Scotland, especially of the Horse, were often charged; whereas the Irish Army continued still unchanged: And although at first, his having been in the late King's Service at Oxford, made them at White-Hall unwilling to employ him; yet he was esteemed of a moderate Behaviour, and had so demeaned himself in the pretended Parliament in the Year 1656, by his Addings against the Kingship of Cromwell, that they would not then disoblige him, least it should seem to be for that Reason: Besides, all of the contrary Faction (of which were the chief of the Army) professed a great esteem of him, not so much in respect of himself, but because it was believed Monck engaged him in those Councils; and the Opinion of that, contributed more than any thing, to divert Oliver from accepting the Crown. Clarges willingly accepted of this Occasion to go to General Monck, to be able to inform himself particularly of his Inclinations: For although he had a Relation to him by Marriage, the Generals so far distant Residence, gave him little Opportunity of other Converse with him than by Letters. The City of London, and the generality of the People in England (having been wearied and tired with the Miseries of War, and their Spirits subdued by the Oppressions and Tyranny of Oliver Cromwell) seemed outwardly to comply with the Necessity of the Time, and submit to an Approbation of that that they could not remedy. By subtle Contrivances, Congratulatory Addresses in all, or most Cities and Counties were framed, subscribed, and presented to him. In Scotland, by private advice to some of the Officers of the Army, things were so prepared, that when Mr. Clarges came thither, he found them all prepossessed, and doubting one the other; they liked, or seemed not to dislike all that was done at London. But the General himself, and he, had many secret Conferences, and the General then declared himself weary of the uncertain Condition, wherein he found both himself and the Nation intrall'd by the over-ruling Tyranny of the Souldiers (who made themselves a divided Interest from the rest of the people) so that they consulted of a Paper to be drawn up to be presented to the new Protector; the heads whereof were to advise him, to suppress the division in the Church, by countenancing a sober and Orthodox Ministry, to permit no Councils of Office; and to model and put the Army into the hands of the qualified Nobility and Gentry of the Nations, as such whom the people might best trust: From this Conference which was managed by both, with much reservedness; Clarges began to perceive the General was in his Principles well fixed to restore his Country to its ancient Government, when ever a fit occasion should present itself for the attempt. With this Paper, and a Letter of approbation of the choice of the Protector, Clarges returned to London, to him; the Letter he delivered publicly, but the Paper was privately communicated, and well liked of by him: and the prosecution of the advice thereof in his attempts to model the Armies, was the main cause of all the divisions which hapned in them, and the happy consequences thereof.

By the same Arts, as those from the Cities and Counties in England, Addresses were promoted, and subscribed by all the Regiments in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging. Lockhart Governour of Dunkirk, who had married his Cousin Germane, was as forward as any to promote Addresses, both from that Garrison and the rest of the English under Major General Morgan, who were yet in the French Army, Commanded by Marshall Turenne, and had gained a great fame and reputation to their Country, by many signal Services in that Campaign; for by their valour, chiefly, a great Victory had been obtained, as before mentioned, over the Spanish Army near Dunkirk, which was followed by the taking of that Town, and the Fort of Mardike, and the Towns and Forts of Bergen, Dixmude, Ferne, Oudenard, Mervin, Gravelin, and Tyre, which last place, taken about the beginning of October, old Style, was the first Military success that the English had abroad under Richards Government. Marshall Turenne had not hopes so late in the Year, to gain a place so considerable; but having beaten a party of 5000 men, under the Prince of Ligne, that was sent to joyn with some other forces; and to visit that Garrison in their march, he supposed that the Town, missing the success they expected, might quickly be surrendered; there were in it about 2500 old Souldiers, besides whom, all the Townsmen assisted, that were able to bear Arms, being in all about 4000; and it was taken in a fortnights Siege. After the Army had been two or three dayes before it, Turenne sent for Major General Morgan, who commanded the English, to order him to keep double Guards, for that he had certain Intelligence that the Prince of Conde intended with all the force he could get together, to put Relief into the place. Morgan informed him, his men were so exposed, that he commonly lost five or six every time they mounted the Guards, and therefore he proposed, that rather than weary them out so much with continuall duty, the Town might be assaulted. Turenne, who was a wary Captain, was unwilling to hazard the Reputation of that Army, which had been victorious by many prosperous successes that Summer, and therefore at first, rejected the advice; but Morgan pressing more upon him, and offering himself with 600 English, to go on upon the strongest part of the Town, he at last consented. He was seconded by two Sergeant Majors, who each of them Commanded 600 French, and were to attack two other places, at the same time that Morgan made his assault; but he with his English, entered and gained most of the out-works, and turned the Cannon of the besieged upon the Town, before his French Succours came in, and immediately the Town was surrendered upon easie termes, the Prince of Ligne, Barbancon, and Arenberg, marched out with the Garrison. Turenne embraced Morgan after this Service; and though he had long before esteemed him a very expert and valiant Captain, he ever after valued him as one of the bravest Commanders of this time, and in the Report of this Action, to the most Christian King he attributed the merit of it wholly to him, which occasioned an Invitation of Morgan to Paris, where he was intimated to him, a good Present of Place was providing to gratifie his Services; but he whose modesty made him ever prefer the virtue of generous actions, before the Reward of them, chose rather to return into England, to his Family and Relations, after his long and hazardous absence.

Some were willing to believe the new Protector had a good affection towards his Majesty, and would use his power to his advantage, as soon as he should be confirmed in it, and had the Army in his absolute obedience, to which they were induced by the observation of his former deportment; for in his private Condition he demeaned himself with civility and respect to the Gentlemen of the Country where he lived, and was alwayes ready to do Offices of kindness to persons in distress, apparently disliking the severity of his Father, and not averse to overtures for his Majesties Reconciliation; but it was afterward evident, that he did but formalize in the doubtful time of his Authority; for when he saw himself owned and acknowledged by the Army and people, he was very much relieved to all that withed well to his Majesty, and either really declined his Service, or had not virtue enough to resist the temptation of greatness, or courage enough toward the declension of his power, to use that little which remained to attempt to free his Country from thralldom and oppressions.

The Young Protector not so great a Well-wisher to his Majesties Cause as was believ'd.

In

In the first place, after his advancement to the Supreme Dignity, principal care was taken by him and his Council, for the Interment of his Father, with all the State and Solemnity accustomed at Kings and Princes Funerals; and therefore search is said to have been made into the Records, to see what had been expended upon the Burial of King James, and the same Cost, if not greater, was to be bestowed on this: The Corps of his late Highness being Embalm'd and wrapt in Lead, was removed from Whitehall to Somerset-house, there to lie in Reg'l Pomp and State, a Spectacle to all Commers; the order and manner whereof was briefly thus:

The manner of the deceased Protector's lying in State at Somerset-house.

Four Rooms, one within another, were compleatly hung with black; the three first with Cloth, the fourth with Velvet, each Room was adorned with Scutcheons of his Arms, Crowned with the Imperial Crown, and at the upper end of each Room, was placed a Chair of State, and over that, a Cloth of State, and over the Cloth, a large Majesty Escutcheon, painted and gilt upon Taffata: In the fourth Room where the Corps were, there lay upon a Bed of State, raised by two gradual Ascents, and covered with a large Pall of black Velvet, his Effigies vested with a rich Suit, Kirtle, and large Robe of Purple Velvet, Laced with Gold, and Furr'd with Ermine: to the Kirtle was girt an embroyd'd Belt, by which hung a Sword richly hatched with Gold, in the right hand was a Golden Scepter, in the left a Globe, on the Head a Purple Velvet Cap, furr'd with Ermines; behind was plac'd a Crown Imperial, set with precious Stones, upon a Chair and Cushion of tissued Gold, on each side a rich Suite of compleat Armour, and at the Feet his Crest: the Bed of State was inclosed with Rails and Ballasters covered with Velvet, at each corner whereof, were Pillars adorned with Trophies of Military Honour, Carved and Gilt; on the tops of the Pillars were the Supporters of the Imperial Arms, bearing Streamers Crown'd; at the Pedestals were Shields and Crowns gilt: within the Rails stood eight Silver Candlesticks, or Standards five Foot high, with long Tapers of Virgin Wax burning in them, and next them four great Standards of his Arms set upright in Sockets, with the Guidons, great Banners, and Banols of Taffata richly painted and gilt. The Effigies having for some time been seen in this posture, was afterwards shewen in another Room, vested after the same manner, and attended with the same Ornaments, as is already described, and this continued untill the day of conducting the Funeral Pomp to the Church, which was on the twenty third of November; for till then, all things could not be prepared and made ready: and then the Effigies placed in a stately Funeral Chariot, covered with black Velvet, and drawn with six Horses in like manner Mantled, and Adorn'd with black Plumes of Feathers, was attended from Somerset-house to Westminster, by all the Officers of his Household, the chief Officers of the Army and Navy, the Magistracy of the City, the Judges at Law, the Ambassadors and publick Ministers of forraign States and Princes, the Members of the late Upper-House, and of the Privy Council, all in Mourning, each Company being distinguished by Drums, Trumpets, a Banner born by one of the chief Ones, and a Horse of State Mantled with black Velvet, led also by some one of Eminency. Lastly, the Horse of Honour trapped with Embroidery upon Crimson Velvet, and adorned with white, red, and yellow Plumes, was led by the Master of the Horse; with such other like Formalities used at the Obsequies of great Persons. At the West end of the Abby-Church, the Effigies being taken out of the Chariot, was carried through the Church under a Canopy of State, born by six of his Gentlemen, up to the East-end where it was plac'd in a sumptuous Catapalco, or Monument of Wood fram'd for the purpose, with Pilasters and other Adornments of Architecture, Carved, Painted, and Gilt, to remain for a certain time, exhibited to publick View; a sort of temporary Monument much used in Foreign Parts, at the death of great Princes: The Corps had been privately Inhum'd many days before the Solemnity, in Henry the Seventh's Chappel.

As soon as the Ceremonious Rites of this great Burial were past, the Preparations for which had for a time very much put a Stop to Proceedings both Domestick and Forain; immediately other matters of publick Concernment began seriously to be taken into Consideration, by the new Protector and his Council. The first thing was, the sending of a Naval Supply to the King of Sweden, between whom and the old Protector, there had been contracted a very firm and inviolable Amity; and Forces had been sent to this Kings Aid out of this Nation, both for Land and Sea-service; for the latter whereof, he now more than ever had occasion to make up a good stout Fleet; for after that by his Success against the King of Denmark, he had won him to a Concession of a great part of his Territories, and of half the Dominion of the Sound, and had at length withdrawn his Army, the King of Denmark judging the Conditions too hard on his side, and alledging them not to have been punctually observ'd by the Swede, began presently after the departure of the Swedish Army, to flie to Arms, for the recovery of what was lost, being especially encouraged thereunto, by a certain assurance of Aid from the Hollanders, besides his entering into Confederacy with the Emperor, the King of Poland, and the Marquis of Brandenburg, against the Swedish King, who having quick Intelligence of the King of Denmark's Design, speeded back with his Forces, and was set down before Copenhagen, ere the Danes were well aware of his coming, but the Danish King had before-hand (providing against the worst that might happen) so well Fortified and restor'd the City, that it was able to endure a long Siege, and now the Sovereignty of this famous Bay of the Baltick Sea, called the Sound, being thus disputed between these two Kings, the Dutch thought it a matter of no small advantage to them, that the Sound should continue in the power of the Dane, their constant Ally, lest the Swede gaining too much sway therein, they might be depriv'd of the benefit hereof, which was of high Concernment to them, and therefore made all possible haste to set forth a Fleet, for the Relief and Supply of Copenhagen: the English on the other side,

A thought it no less Imported them to help the Swede, though it were against the Dane and the Dutch, both of them our Friends in outward appearance, least their joynt Interest and prevalence against the Swede, who of all other Potentates was the most firmly united in League to this State, might have prov'd prejudicial to us likewise in relation to the Sound, which also concern'd us no less weightily than the Dutch, therefore a Squadron of lusty Frigots was sent forth by this State, under the Command of Sir George Ayscough, toward the Sound, which having for some time been detain'd upon the Coast by contrary Winds, and afterwards steering their course towards those Northern Seas, which the extremity of the Winter had made impassable, they were forced for that time to return not without some damage to the Ships, by reason of the Ice, and the loss of some men, through the bitterness of the Weather in those parts, so that this Enterprize was suspended till the coming on of the Spring, and then a more powerful Fleet was set out under the Command of General Montague, Sir George Ayscough being invited by the King of Sweden to take upon him a chief Command in his Navy.

In the mean time, the Hollanders Fleet led by General Opdam, and Witte Wittels, arriving at the Sound, with Relief for Copenhagen, were Assail'd by the Swedish Rix-Admiral, Charles Gustavus Wrangle, in which Battel the Dutch are said to have received a notable Overthrow, seven of their Ships being lost, and Witte Wittels one of their Admirals, with many other persons of Quality slain; nevertheless, during the Fight, several Dutch Fluyts and Merchant-men pass'd by with Provision to Copenhagen, which to strengthen the Besieged, that they thereby became enabled for the sustaining of a long Siege, as hath since appear'd: and not long after, the Swedes in a resolute effort against the City, were repel'd with the loss of a great many men, and some of Eminency.

And now in England, want of Moneys, and other pressing occasions of the State, require the sudden calling of a Parliament: the young Protector issues out his Writs, summoning the Members to meet at Westminster the 27th of January. Elections are made by the Counties, not without some Canvassing of Parties.

Moreover, according to the Constitution of the Government, Members were Elested to the Commons House for Ireland and Scotland, as well as England. The Elections were so disposed in England, that many honest Gentlemen in all parts were chosen, but the upper (for it did not yet aspire to the name of Lords) House, even was filled with the chief Officers of the Army, whereof most were of such contemptible extraction, and education, that the Commons were very unwillingly brought in any capacity whatsoever to own them. From the time of Summons of this Parliament, to their convening, he was frequently entertained with the fore-mentioned Addressees, which much heightened the confidence he had entertained of his future prosperity, and made him think of modelling the Council conformable to designs he had of subjecting the Army to his intire Command; for the Council, as the Government then stood, had a great co-ordination with him, in the administration of it, and the major part consisted of such as countenanced in all their extravagancies the Officers of the Army, who were many of them Anabaptists, and of other Sects.

He pretended not to remove any of the Councillors, but to add to many of his friends to them as might make the greater number firm to him, he propos'd the Lord Broughill, and Faulconbridge, who had married his Sister, but they were not approved of; and instead of these, it was offer'd by those that oppos'd them, that four Colonels of the Army might be admitted, (viz.) Whaley, Goff, Berry, and Cooper: The first two had been of the late Kings Judges, but were ill affected to the Protector and his Family: the other two were factious and seditious. These Transactions were not agitated in open Council, but privately treated of by particular persons; but so rumour'd, that the Army began to be jealous of the Protector, and murmur at his actions; sometimes they would complain of the Company and Conversation he used, and at other times, censure his Religion, exclaiming, that godliness was discouraged by him, and that he rather favour'd those of loose Principles than the zealous Professors of the Gospel. But in this he was injur'd, for if his private Condition represented him a kind of libertine, he assum'd together with the publick Person a more grave and circumspect behaviour, conform'd himself to the constant observation of all Religious Duties, and with appearance at least, if not really so, of a blameless Life and Conversation.

The Grandees of the Army, doubtfull of the temper of the approaching Parliament, moved the Protector to call together some of the Officers of the Army to London, (as his Father was accustomed to do on the like occasions) to advise with him, to obviate any peril that might happen in the beginning of his Power, if the Parliament should attempt Innovations: He was a little surprized at this Advice, but thought it not time to refuse it, and thereupon Letters were sent to as many of them as could be spared from their Charges, to repair to London, to be there at the opening of the Parliament. The Names of his Fathers Privy Councillors which acted and were continued under him, were Richard Lawrence President, Nathaniel Fiennes, one of the Keepers of the Great Seal; John Thynlor, Secretary of State; General Montague, Sir Charles Woolley, Colonel Philip Jones, Philip Lord Lisle, Son of the Earl of Leicester; Lieut. Gen. Eleewood, Colonel Debrow, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Col. Sydenham, Walter Strickland, Col. Philip Skippon; of which the Six last named, were Favourers and Abettors of the Army; Lawrence the President was an Anabaptist, but somewhat moderate in his Opinion. The Lord Lisle was often absent and uncertain, endeavouring as much as he could to appear a Neuter. There was another whom I should have named, which was Mr. Major, the Protector's Wives Father, but his indisposition of health rendered rendered him incapable of action; Fleetwood and Desbrow had frequent Meetings at Desbrow's house, who with the Factious part of this Council, and some of the Colonels of the Army that favoured them, which were Barry, Hewson, Coopers, and Lilburn, consulted to wrest the power of the Army out of the Protector's hands; and in order thereunto, Desbrow was sent to tell him, That the Army was filled with many Jealousies and Fears of Designs against it, which would put them into Mutiny, and inevitably hazard the subversion of the Government, unless some speedy remedy were taken for prevention, and that no better way could be thought on, then putting the Command of the Army into the hands of some person that had served with them, and of whole Courage, and Integrity to their Cause, they might have Confidence and Assurance; and immediately named Fleetwood to be the man, adding, That this would not only satisfy the Army, but give great content to the Godly Party, (which was a name much used by all these Novelists) and free him from much of the trouble which rendered him now less intent in the more necessary parts of Government. To this he replied, That as to the Fears and Jealousies of the Army, when he knew their Grounds, he would give them what Redress could be desired, not doubting but the Parliament, now ready to sit down, would take care both for his and their Security, and the Peace and Quiet of the Nations: But as to the Command of the Army, he freely told them, He should not think himself able to protect himself or them, if he should part with it, which his Fathers Example confirmed him in. And with this Answer dismissed him. His Father, as was before mentioned, was much perplexed before he died, with many seditious Anabaptist Officers of the Army, who were impatient of his Government, but the Fear and Danger of a Division, and respect to his Person, kept them in some degree of Obedience; He displaced many of them before he dyed, and had reduced the rest, and wholly modelled the Army to depend on him, if he had lived a few Months longer: He had introduced his Son my Lord Faulconbridge, and many others into chief Commands, who were allied to him in blood, or by their advancement wholly depending on him: All this while matters were carried without much heat, and not out of possibility of accommodation when the Parliament sat down.

At the prefixed time, the Parliament meets, consisting, as the last Parliament had done in his Fathers time, of Two Houses, the Commons, and the Other (which now began to be called the Upper-House) for the first was chosen Speaker, Mr. Chaloner Chute, a Lawyer, who within a short while fell sick unto death as also Sir Lislebone Long Recorder of London, who was chosen pro tempore in his stead; For the latter was chosen, Nathaniel Fiennes Lord Keeper of the Seal: The first Grand business that came under Debate, was a Bill to be passed into a Law, Intituled, An Act of Recognition of the Protector to be chief Governour of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging: Which was many dayes debated in parts, and at last part of it resolved in these words; viz. That it be part of this Bill to recognize and declare his Highness Richard Lord Protector and Chief Magistrate of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging. And it was added, That neither this nor any other previous Vote that is or shall be passed in order to this Bill, shall be of force or binding to the People until the whole be passed. The Protector liked well these proceedings, and thought himself towards a good Settlement; but of those that were zealous for a Commonwealth, there was also in this Parliament such a considerable number, and who had such a powerful influence on publick Transactions, that to procrastinate the time, they cast in several praiseworthy Debates, in which, nevertheless, the Assertors of the Protector's Interest being more in number, carried things to their own Advantage by the Major Vote, as particularly in the business of the Scotch and Irish Members to be continued in among them, and the owing of the Upper-House, and holding an Entercourse with them, after a long Consultation in question of their Authority. However, the Factious Counsellors which abetted Discontents in the Army, continued their Meetings to pursue their purpose of wresting the Command of the Army out of his hands, and putting it under Fleetwood.

Several Designs had been in vain undertaken for his Majesties Restauration during the Usurpation of Oliver Cromwell, which were chiefly managed by the Earl of Oxford, the Lord John Bellasis, Sir John Grenville, Sir William Compton, Colonel John Russell, and Sir Richard Willis, who for their supposed conduct of the privacy of their Counsellors, were commonly call'd, The Seal'd Knot: But, though nothing was more prudently and ingeniously contriv'd, all their Consultations were from time to time imparted to Thurloe by Sir Richard Willis, which was not yet known. Nevertheless, his Majestie about this time thought fit to appoint new Commissioners, and sent over into England a blank Commission dated at Bruxells the 11th day of March, in the 11th year of his Reign, which was fill'd up with the Names of Arthur Anley, Son to the Viscount Valentia; John Morant, Brother to the Earl of Peterborough; Sir John Greenville, Sir Thomas Peyton, and William Legg; which was as followeth:

CHARLES by the Grace of God King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To Our Right Truly and Right Wellbelov'd, &c. and to every of them, Greeting. We do by these Presents Constitute and Appoint you Our Commissioners, giving you or any one or more of you Power to Treat with any Our Subjects of Our Kingdom of England, and Dominion of Wales, that are or have been in Arms against us or Our Father of Blessed Memory, or that have contributed to the present

A sent Rebellion in England, (Excepting such as actually sate in Judgment for the taking away the life of Our said Father, or pleaded as Counsel Learned against his life, or attended as Ministers to that odious pretended Court, or laid hands on his person in the execution of that horrid Murder) And to assure them in Our Name, That if they shall forsake the present Rebellion, and joy heartily and effectually for the suppressing of the same, and for Our Restauration to the Rights due to us by the Laws of God, and of that Our Kingdom; That then We will not only freely pardon their former opposing us and Our dear Father, and all their Crimes and Offences in acting, adhering to or complying with the said Rebellion; But that We will Recompose and Reward such of them as shall by any remarkable Service merit us, either by reducing or rendring any Town, Fort, or Garrison of the Rebels into Our hands, or into the possession and power of you or of any other Trustee, employed by us or you for Our Service: And what you or any one or more of you shall by virtue of this Our Commission in Writing under your hands, or the hands of any one or more of you, promise in Our Name in this kind, We shall Ratify and Confirm, and perform. Given at Our Court at Bruxells this 11th day of March, 1659. in the Eleventh Year of Our Reign.

These Gentlemen proceeded with much Wariness and Diligence in the execution of this Commission, the Effects whereof shall be made known hereafter; But in the mean time, we shall return to what passed between the Parliament and Army. Besides the private Meetings of some select Officers at Desbrow's house, the General Council of Officers (as they called themselves) met in Fleetwood's house, where they acted with as much formality, as if they had been the Supreme Legislators of the three Kingdoms.

It was a little before Cromwell's Death, that great preparation was begun for the setting forth of a Fleet to the help of the Swedes against the Danes, and that under the Command of General Mountague, nor did his death put a stop thereunto, Sir George Ayscough being sent with a Squadron of Ships, though hindered from coming up to joyn with them, by reason of the freezing of those Seas, as hath been already mention'd; whereupon, for the better managing of the Charge, it was thought expedient that the House of Commons should be engag'd in it, and a Narrative Report was made to them by Secretary Thurloe about the latter end of February this year, concerning the State of the War betwixt the Crowns of Sweden and Denmark, in relation to the Baltic Sea, and the Command of the Sound: This took so far, as to gain a Vote for the providing a considerable Navy for the preservation of Trade, which was forthwith Equipped, and General Mountague sent with it to the Sound about the latter end of March, who was so straitned in his Commission, that he lay there without doing any thing, till he was called back by that part of the Long Parliament that subverted the Power that sent him.

The Upper House (as it now began to be call'd in a strain somewhat nearer Lords House) favoured the Military Council of Officers, but the Commons took much distast at it, as if it portended a kind of Force upon their Counsellors. The Protector in the mean time advised with his Friends, how to free himself from the Embarrassments of the Officers of the Army; My Lord Faulconbridge, Col. Ingoldsby, Col. Bridge, Col. Charles Howard, Major Knight, all Officers in the Army, and some few others, counselled him to send a party to Desbrow's house, to seize upon those that met there, which were Eight or Nine of the chief Confederates, and immediately to give their Commands to the next Officers to them, till he could have a fairer opportunity to put them into better hands; and to send for all the rest of the Officers to come to him, and to Command all of them to repair to their respective Commands, that were not obliged by Service in Parliament to attend that duty. These Counsellors were very agreeable to his Inclination, but the Secretary of State and some others to whom he brake the business, diverted him from the first but to the latter, of dismissing the Officers, readily consented; and the next day he sent for them, and dismissed them accordingly: And the same day that this was by him done, the Commons openly debated against this Assembly of Officers, and Voted, That during the Sitting of the Parliament, there should be no General Council or meeting of the Officers of the Army, without direction, leave and authority of the Protector and both Houses of Parliament. And because in the Debate of these Questions, many that favoured the Army, had cunningly cast out some minatory Expressions, insinuating, That this way of proceeding might make them think themselves suspected, and provoke them to break forth into some act of opposition and disturbance, they passed another Resolve, That no person should have or continue Command in any of the Armies in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or any of the Dominions or Territories thereunto belonging, who shall refuse to subscribe, That he will not disturb or interrupt the free meeting in Parliament of any the Members of either House of Parliament, or their freedomen in their Debates and Councils. These were transmitted to the Lords House, to be confirmed there; but they made a slow progress in them, upon divers late contracted Jealousies, nor the least of which was from a late Vote of the Commons, wherein they declared at the acknowledgment of their Constitution, That their acknowledgment of That House for another House of Parliament, should not prejudice the Perage of the Land, or their Priviledges: as also believing, that the Protector conspired with the Commons to weaken and divide, or subdue the Power of the Army; in which they were somewhat confirmed, for that these matters were Debated and Voted the same day he had dissolved the Council of Officers, and dismissed them. The Protector had many of the chief Officers of the Army fixed to him, but the inferior sort who were of phanatique Opinions in Religion, and were more numerous, and had most influence upon the Souldiers, were for Fleetwood and Desborow: For it was artificially insill'd into their heads, That the Protector did intend to cast them out of their Places, and put the Army into the hands of the Nobility, and Gentry of the Nation, thereby to bring in the King, and destroy that Liberty of the Gospel they had so long contended for. The Debate against the Army in the House of Commons, was on the 19th day of April, from which time the meetings of the Officers were more frequent than before, and upon the 22th day, the Protector was informed, that they would either themselves dissolve the Parliament, or compel him to do it. He called his Confidants about him, and made preparations against all accidents that might happen: in the Evening, many of his friends encouraged him to take Horse, and appear in the Heads of some Troops that were ready to receive him. While this was doing, the other party had drawn up some men in the severall Avenues to White-Hall, and in St. James's Field, it was believed, if he had appeared with vigour and courage amongst them, respect of his Person would have prevailed much with the common Souldiers; but he was fearfull, and unresolv'd, of a Spirit unbecoming the quality he assumed, and many of those about him were as irresolute as he, some advised one thing, some another, waiting their time in contradictions; and as it happens in the Consultations of fearfull people, they debated many things fit to be done, till the time was past to put them in execution. Desborow his Uncle came to him from the discontented Officers, and pressed him much to sign a Commission to Fines, to dissolve the Parliament, which he a great while obstinately refused, till Desborow insolently told him, if he did it not, it should be done without him, and so urged by threats, and importunities, he at length consented to do it.

The next Morning, the House of Commons having heard of these Transactions at White-Hall, Adjourned themselves for three days: but this their Adjournment prov'd a total Dissolution, for those that had made this breach upon them, proceeded further to conpleat their purposes, and besides the foresaid Commission directed to Fines, caused a Proclamation to come forth in the Protector's Name, to publish the Dissolution of the Parliament, in these words:

Whereas We Summoned Our High Court of Parliament to Assemble and Meet together at Our City of Westminster the 27th day of January last, which hath continued until this present day; And whereas We did by Our Commission under Our Great Seal of England bearing date at Westminster this present 22. day of April, for divers weighty Reasons declare Our Pleasure and Resolution to Dissolve the said Parliament, and to that end did thereby constitute and appoint Our Right Trusty and Right welbelov'd Counsellour Nathaniel Fiennes, One of the Lord Keepers of Our Great Seal of England, and others Our Commissioners in Our Name, this said present Twmy second day of April, to Dissolve Our said Parliament, which was by them done according to the Tenor of the said Commission in the usual place; And by vertue thereof, Our said Parliament is Dissolved: Nevertheless, We have thought it necessary with the Advice of Our Privy Councils, by this Our Proclamation, to publish and make known the same, to the end all Persons whom it may concern, may take notice thereof. Given at White-Hall the Twenty second day of April, in the Year of our Lord, 1659.

Fleetwood and Desborow having (to get the power of the Army to them, and their Party) made this Breach upon the Parliament, and in it shaken the Protector's Government, intended of themselves, as it should seem, nothing less then to dethrone him, though by reason of what they had already done, they quickly found it was not in their power to prevent what they so little intended, they came to him together, and apart several times that day after it was done, and protested to him, That his Power in all things, but the immediate Command of the Army, should be preserved inviolate; and even in that, nothing should be done, but in his Name, and by his Privy; telling him, They had not taken this course, but upon certain Assurance of the Defense of the King's Party, and others, to disturb the publick Peace, which nothing could prevent, but the breaking up of that Parliament.

He received not much Consolation from these Discourses, and gave little Credit to them, well knowing, that it was far easier to draw the Officers of the Army into Seditious Courses, then to moderate them. He told them, he doubted not of their Intentions, and that they had been practised upon to do that in haste, which they might have leisure enough to revent; and that they would find now, they had made a Confusion of his Power, it would be a Province too hard for them to re-settle it: And so it proved, in effect; for at the first Meeting of the Officers at Wallingford House, after the Emission of the afore-mentioned Proclamation, they would not hear of any thing in behalf of the Protector, and were so far from thinking of the Continuance of his Power, that when any thing was moved tending that way, it was obstructed, or diverted, by Propositions of Government. Yet at last, when they had determin'd, that the Chief Command of the Army should be in Fleetwood, with Power to dispose of all Vacant Offices till farther Order, they were perswaded to Allow the Protector a kind of Limited Supremacy (for what like that of a Duke of Venice). But the next day, whilst many of the Superiour Officers met at Wallingford House,

The Superiour Officers meet at Wallingford House, to consider of a Model of Government, and the inferior Officers at St. James's.

A in further consideration of a Model of Government, the inferior Officers being the most numerous, assembled in the Chappel at St. James's, having Dr. Owen, and other Independent Ministers with them, to assist at their Devotion, where the Matter was artificially so contriv'd, that the prosperity they enjoy'd under the Government of the latter part of the Commons House of the Long Parliament, was much magnified; with some Intimations of Advice, to return to that Government, with which the Auditors were very much affected, but nothing more was done at that time. This was promoted by Lambert and his Friends, wherein he appeared not openly himself, but set Colonel Lilburn to manage the Business, at whose Chamber his Friends had private Junctures.

The next Day Fleetwood and Desborow were alarm'd with this Countermine against their Designs; for the Inferiour Officers came now to open Declaration of their forwardness, to restore the latter part of the Long Parliament, and to restore to their Command Lambert and the rest of the Officers, who had been displac'd by Oliver Cromwell, for disaffection to him; yet not without too much respect to the Protector, and his Family, but that they would have an Honourable Provision made for them. Fleetwood endeavour'd to oppose this Torrent, suspecting Lambert's Ambition would quickly supplant him, if he got power: But when he perceiv'd it was already too great to be resisted, the Consideration thereof oblig'd both him and Desborow to comply, for the preservation of their Authority. However, to retard their proceedings, they propos'd, first, to have the Army settled and modelled in a way of Unity, before they determin'd upon the Government, which was thought rational; and at a Meeting of a General Council of Officers, in order thereunto, they removed the Protector from his Regiment, and the Colonels Ingoldsby, Howard, the Lord Faulconbridge, and Colonel Bridge from theirs: Colonel Norton they displaced from the Government of Portsmouth, which they gave to Colonel Whitburn, and made Colonel Edward Salmon Governor of Hull, in the Room of Colonel Smith, who, by the recommendation of Fleetwood, had the Command of that Garrison given him by Oliver Cromwell. To Colonel Sanders they gave the Protector's Regiment of Horse, to Colonel Rich that of Ingoldsby's; to Sir Arthur Haslerigg Colonel Howard's Regiment of Foot, with the Government of Warwick, Carlisle, and Tinnmouth: To Lambert they gave the Lord Falkenbridge's Regiment; and to Okey that which was his own before, which was lately commanded by Colonel Bridge: Major Parker, and Captain Gladman, Andabaptist Officers, who had been by Oliver Cromwell displaced, were restored to their Commands: The inferior Officers, in all their respective Regiments, were suitably model'd, according to the Opinions of their Colonels.

Thus Lambert was brought into the Army, wherein he quickly recover'd much of his former power. After this, the Council of Officers was reduced to a smaller Number.

The 29th of April there met at Fleetwood's House, Lambert, Desborow, Sydenham, Cooper, John Jones, Berry, Hacker, Lilburn, Ashfield, Salmon, Zanchy, Okey, Sanders, Clark, all Colonels, and Major-General Kelsey, and Barkstead the Lieutenant of the Tower, where they Debated the Election of a Council, which should have a Negative upon the Remnant Parliament, when it should be restored: But after much Debate, that was thought fitter for the Debate of the Parliament than them.

They next consult about some Articles, for the security of themselves and their Friends, and for a Foundation, on which they would oblige their Parliament, to establish the Common-wealth Government.

These Articles being Digested into Form, and agreed to by the General Council, a certain number of the Officers were Deputed to meet with Sir Henry Vane, Sir Arthur Haslerigg, Mr. Scot, and Major Salloway, the prime Leading Men in this Parliament, to consider how they might be disposed to consent to them. Vane and those with him had been treated with apart; but when they came to publique Discourse, they were very reserv'd in their Answers; yet they gave them hopes of their own Consents, and of their Endeavours to prevail upon others; but said, they could not undertake by any previous Agreement, to oblige the Parliament, without their Authority and Consent, at such time as they were met together.

This Cautious of theirs was disliked and suspected by Fleetwood, Desborow, and Lambert; but the inferior Officers were so far possess'd in favour of them, that it was not time to contend. They therefore desir'd them to use means, to draw as many of the Members as they could together with all convenient haste, because the Government was a kind of Inter-regnum; and the Officers in the mean time drew up a Declaration to invite them to sit, which upon the sixth of May was presented to the Speaker by Lambert, with about 12 or 14 Officers of the Army in his Company. The Declaration itself we have thought fit to insert, to shew the inconsistency of these new Politicians, that so soon alter'd from what they so solemnly declar'd: The Title was,

A Declaration of the Officers of the Army, inviting the Members of the Long-Parliament, who continued sitting till the 20th of April, 1653. to return to the Exercise and Discharge of their Trust.

THE Publique Concernments of this Common-wealth, being through a Vicissitude of Dangers, Deliverances, and Back-slidings of many, brought into that state and posture wherein they now stand, and our selves also contributing therunto, by wandering divers ways from Righteous and equal parts; And although there have been many Essays to obviate obviate the Dangers, and to settle the Nations in peace and prosperity; yet all have proved ineffectual. The only wise God, in the Course of his Providence, disappointing all Endeavours therein. And also observing to our great Grief, that the good Spirit which formerly appeared amongst us, in the carrying on of this great Work, did daily decline: so as the Good Old Cause it self became a Reproach: we have been led to look back, and to examine the Cause of the LORD's withdrawing his wonted presence from us, and where we turned out of the way, that through Mercy we might return and give him the Glory.

And amongst other things, calling to mind that the Long Parliament, consisting of the Members which continued their sitting untill the 20th of April, 1653. were eminent Assertors of that Cause, and had a special presence of GOD with them, and were signally blessed in that Work, (the Desires of many good people concurring with ours therein,) we judge it our Duty to invite the aforesaid Members, to return to the Exercise and Discharge of their Trust, as before the said 20th of April, 1653.

And therefore we do hereby most earnestly desire the Parliament, consisting of those Members who continued to sit since the Year 1648. untill the 20th of April, 1653. to return to the Exercise and Discharge of their Trust; and we shall be ready in our Places, to yield them, as becomes us, our utmost Assistance to sit in Safety, for the improving present Opportunities, for settling and securing the Peace and Freedom of the Commonwealth, praying for the Presence and Blessing of GOD upon their Endeavours.

Signed by Direction of the Lord Fleetwood, and the Council of Officers of the Army.

Thomas Sandford, Secretary.

They agree to accept of the Invitation.

And take their Places in the House.

Gen. Monk seems to give his Consent to what was done in England.

They publish their Intentions by a Declaration. The Words of the Declaration, extracted out of the Parliament Journals.

Sir G. Booth, M. Pryn, & others, of the old Secluded Members, claim their privilege of sitting, but are kept out.

After the delivery of this, many of the most eminent Members of this Remnant of the Long Parliament, having before consulted with as many of the rest as were in London, came also and gave a Visit to the Speaker, to signify their willingness to return to the Exercise of their Trust, (as they call'd it) in pursuance of the Invitation given them by the Army, and that they would meet the next morning, which was the 8th of May, at 8 of the Clock in the Painted-Chamber, where they desired his Presence, to accompany them from thence to the Parliament-House; which he accordingly did, and they all went together, and took their Places. Thus ended the Reign, or rather the Usurpation of the Cromwells, being overthrown by those of their nearest Relations, from whom by Interest, they might have expected Support: But such was the Fate of this ill-acquir'd Dominion, to be subverted in its greatest Security, by the Ambition and Malice of those that assisted the Aspirers in the obtaining of it.

Upon the Dissolution of the Protector's Parliament, Diligence was used by Charges to acquaint Monk with all Occurrences: But the Officers of the Army in Scotland, then in London, of Fleetwood's Party, had so dispersed Letters amongst their Friends, to engage them for the restoring of this latter part of the Long-Parliament, that when he conven'd some of them at Edenborough to found their Tempers, he perceiv'd they had been wrought upon; and therefore he judg'd it most prudent, to seem to approve of what was done: And to that purpose, he writ a Letter signed by himself and his Officers, to the Officers at London, which gave them Assurance of his Adherence to them (but if Richard had not dissolv'd his Parliament, Monk had then march'd into England in favour of it.) They did not fear much any Storms from the Army in Ireland, who of themselves could do little, without correspondence from England or Scotland.

The first thing the Remnant Parliament did when they met, after Election of their Officers, was, the passing a short Declaration, which was Order'd to be Printed and Published: in the Close whereof they do Declare; That they are Resolv'd, through the gracious Assistance of Almighty GOD, to apply themselves to the Faithfull Discharge of the Trust reposed in them; and to endeavour the Settlement of this Commonwealth upon such a Foundation, as may assert, establish, and secure, the Property and Liberties of the People, in reference unto all, both as Men and as Christians; and that without a Single Person, Kingship, or House of Peers: And shall vigorously endeavour the carrying on of Reformation so much desired, and so often declared for; to the end there may be a Godly and Faithfull Magistracy and Ministry upheld and maintained in the Nations, to the Glory and Praise of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the reviving and making glad the Hearts of the Upright in the Land.

Sir George Booth, Colonel Rossiter, Mr. Pryn, and some others, Members of the Commons House of this Parliament, (formerly secluded by the Army) attempted to go into the House, but were all kept back by Adjutant General Allen, except Mr. Pryn, who slipt in, but they would do nothing whilst he was amongst them, but adjourn'd till the afternoon; and when he again would have enter'd, he was stay'd by some Officers of the Army.

About four days after the present small Parliament had sat, which was spent in making a Committee of Safety, and dispatching Intelligence of their being re-inflated in their former Power, to several

A several of their Members absent in the Country, whom they had not disabled from Sitting; the Officers of the Army present themselves with their Petition and Address, a thing they often insisted to have prosecuted; and was one of the occasions that had formerly heightened the differences betwixt them and this Parliament.

The Title was, The Humble Petition and Address of the Officers of the Army, to the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England. The Address it self was in these words following:

Calling to mind the former Declarations of Parliament, and the Grounds therein inviting us to take up Arms, and those many signal Providences, wherein the Lord hath owned You and your Forces both by Sea and Land, in asserting that Righteous Cause, wherein the Civil and Religious Liberties of the People of these Nations were involved, so as that all open opposition was beaten down before you; and likewise weighing with ourselves how in the severall late Changes in Government, that Publique Spirit, which appeared in that Work, hath since that time been discouraged, and another raised up, drawing back to the same things you had contended against, even to the hazarding the Essentials of that Cause; we did upon serious thoughts of heart think it our duty once more to appear against those backsliding ways, and Providence having brought the state of Affairs to the condition they were in some few days before your sitting, we found it necessary to assert amongst our selves some of the Fundamentals of our Good Old Cause, with some other things conducing to the Preservation thereof, with a full and fixed resolution, through the assistance of GOD, effectually, even to the hazard of our Lives, to endeavour the Recovery and Security of the same. And the same good Providence holding forth an opportunity to us, to open unto You away for the further discharge of the remaining Trust in Parliament, we did by our Declaration of this instant May, humbly desire you would be pleased to return to the exercise and discharge thereof, as before the 20th of April, 1653. And having to our great joycing seen your Declaration of the seventh Instant, shewing, that you are resolv'd through the Gracious assistance of Almighty GOD, to apply your selves to the faithful discharge of the Trust reposed in you; and to endeavour the Settlement of this Commonwealth upon such a Foundation, as may assert, establish, and secure the Liberties of the People, in reference unto all, both as Men, and Christians, and that without a Single Person, Kingship, or House of Peers, resolving vigorously the carrying on the Work of Reformation, so much desir'd, and so often declar'd for, to the end there may be a Godly and faithful Magistracy and Ministry upheld and maintained in these Nations; which so fully answers what our hearts were drawn forth to desire, that we could not any longer forbear to express our thankfulness for this door of hope again open'd towards the attaining a consummation of those things so much breathed after by the good people of this Commonwealth. And however we find our selves in some measure prevented, by the late Declaration and Resolves of this Parliament: Yet nevertheless, we have judg'd it our duty to represent what was chiefly and unanimously upon our hearts, when we engag'd in that which made way for your Return, which we humbly (as becomes us) lay before you:

1. That the Liberty of the Persons, and Property of the Estates of all free people of these Nations, be maintained, preserved, and kept inviolable according to Law, under the Government of a Free State and Commonwealth, without a Single Person, Kingship, or House of Peers.
2. That there may be such a just and due Regulation of Law, and Courts of Justice and Equity, as that they may be a Protection, and not vexations or oppressive, to the People of these Nations.
3. That by an Act of Oblivion, all and every person and persons who have since the 19th of April, 1653. mediately or immediately advised, acted, or done any matter or thing whatsoever, in reference to the severall Changes or Alterations in the Government of these Nations since the said 19th of April, 1653; or in order to the Publique Service, Peace, or Safety of these Nations, be Indemnified and saved harmless, to all intents and purposes whatsoever.
4. That all Laws, Ordinances, Declarations, and Establishments made in the severall Changes and Alterations of Government, that have been in these Nations, since the 19th of April aforesaid, and not as yet particularly repealed, be deemed good in Law, untill particularly repealed.
5. That such Debts as have been contracted for the publique service and affairs of this

Commonwealth, and for the Charges of the Government, since the 20th of April, 1653. A be carefully paid and satisfied.

6. That all persons who profess Faith in GOD the Father, and in Jesus Christ his Eternal Sonne the true GOD, and in the Holy Spirit, GOD Co-equall with the Father and the Sonne, one GOD blessed for ever, and do acknowledge the holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the revealed or written word or Will of GOD, shall not be restrained from their Professing, but have due encouragement and equall protection in the profession of their Faith and exercise of Religion, whilest they abuse not their Liberty to the civil injury of others, or disturbance of others in their way of worship: So that this Liberty be not extended to Popery or Prelacy, nor to such as shall practise or hold forth Licentiousness or prophaneſs under the profession of Religion: And that all Laws, Statutes, Ordinances, and Clauses in any Laws, Statutes, or Ordinances to the contrary, may be declared null, and void.

7. That a Godly, Faithful and Painful Gospel Preaching Ministry be every where encouraged, countenanced, and maintained.

8. That the Universities and Schools of Learning be so countenanced and reformed, as that they may become the Nurseries of Piety and Learning.

9. That such persons as have at any time since the 20th of May, 1642. aided, or assisted or adhered to the late King, Charles Stuart his Son, or any other person or persons whatsoever of that Party, against the Parliament or Commonwealth of England, and all other persons whatsoever that have made use of any Authority or Power under pretence of Law, or otherwise, to deprive or abridge any of the good People of these Nations of their Christian Liberty, or have or shall express themselves in any way mockers, scoffers, or revilers of Godliness, or of the professors thereof, or are otherwise scandalous or loose in their conversations, or have not given good satisfaction of their affection and faithfulness to this Cause, may be speedily removed out of all places of Power or Trust in the Magistracy, or other management of the Publique Affairs of these Nations, and that no such persons may be admitted unto any such Place of Power or Trust for the future.

10. And forasmuch as no godly or other good Interest can be preserved or maintained, unless the persons who are chiefly intrusted with the management and exercise of the Government, be of suitable spirits to those Interests, That those who are or shall be intrusted therein, be such persons as shall be found to be most eminent for Godliness, faithfulness and constancy to the good Cause and Interests of these Nations.

11. That to the end the Legislative Authority of this Commonwealth may not by their long sitting become burthenſome or inconvenient, there may be effectually Provision made for a due Succession thereof.

12. And for the better satisfaction, and more firm Union of the Forces of this Commonwealth, in this juncture of Affairs, for preserving and maintaining the Principles and other matters thereunto subservient: We do unanimously acknowledge and own the Lord Charles Fleetwood Lieut. General of the Army, to be Commander in Chief of the Land Forces of this Commonwealth.

13. That in order to the establishing and securing the Peace, Welfare, and Freedom of the People of these Nations for the ends before expressed, the Legislative power thereof may be in a Representative of the People, consisting of a House successively chosen by the People in such way and manner as this Parliament shall judge meet, and of a select Senate, co-ordinate in Power, of able and faithful persons, eminent for Godliness, and such as continue adhering to this Cause.

14. That the administration of all Executive Power of Government, may be in a Councill of State, consisting of a convenient number of Persons qualified in all respects as aforesaid.

15. That all Debts Contracted by his late Highness, or his Father, since the 15th of December, 1653. may be satisfied, and that an honourable Revenue of Ten thousand pounds per annum, with a convenient House, may be settled upon him, and his Heirs for ever; and Ten thousand pounds per annum more upon him during life: And upon his Honourable Mother Eight Thousand pounds per annum during her life. To the end a mark of the high Esteem this Nation hath of the good Service done by his Father, our ever Renowned Generall, may remain to Posterity. These having been the Thoughts and Desires of our Hearers, unanimously agreed upon before Your Returning to Sit, and finding the spirits of divers of the honest faithful people of this Commonwealth, led forth for the same

A same things, and your selves by your late Declaration and Resolutions in a great measure assisting them; we thought it our Duty to the Nations, to You, and to the Honest People, humbly to present these, and beg the Blessing and Presence of the LORD with you in the Prosecution and bringing forth such a Settlement as may be for the Honour of GOD, the Union, Joy and Rejoycing of all the Peaceable People of the Commonwealth.

And we shall pray, &c.

This Petition was presented by Lambert the 12th day of May, accompanied with Deborow and Barkstead the Lieutenant of the Tower, with 12 other Colonels, and two Lieutenant Colonels. We find entered in the Parliament Journall the words which Lambert spake at the delivery of it, which were these:

Mr. Speaker,

WE are Commanded by the Officers of the Army, to present before you their Humble Petition and Address; there are severall things contained in it, which have been a long time upon their hands, and no visible way of redress: Finding to their great Joy and Satisfaction, that you are Returned; In discharge of their Trust, they thought it not fit to neglect this opportunity, but have Commanded us to present this Petition.

When he had said these words, he withdrew, with those that were with him; and the House upon Debate Order'd their Speaker to return them the following Answer: Which is likewise entered in the Journall of that Day's Proceedings.

I Am Commanded by the House to tell you, That they have read the Petition and Address that you have made here to us; They have commanded me likewise to tell you, That as they found your Affection before they came thither, so they find that affection continuing.

For the things contain'd in your Petition, they are things of great weight, and many more things of great weight are lying before the House; and it is concerning that Settlement, for which the Divine Providence of GOD hath brought us hither, who we hope shall never depart from us.

The House finds in your Advice much of love and affection, and have commanded me to acknowledge that love and affection you have shown, and to give you thanks, very hearty thanks for your love, and expressions of it; And accordingly in their Name I do give you very hearty thanks.

The House by Votes agreed to all the Articles of this Petition, at the first debate of it, except such as concerned the publick Revenue; Government, and the Protector, which were refer'd to a Committee, whom they directed to go to the Protector, and receive an acknowledgment from him of his submission to the Government, before they would do any thing for him, and take a State of his debts: Which being declared to him, with the Resolve of the House, the occasion of that Messige; After Consideration, he delivered the following answer to them in Writing, with his name to it.

I Have perused the Resolve and Declaration which you were pleased to deliver to me the other night, and for the information touching what is mentioned in the said Resolve, I have caused a true state of my debts, to be transcribed and annexed to this Paper, which will shew what they are, and how they were contracted.

As to that part of the Resolve, whereby the Committee are to inform themselves, how far I do acquiesce in the Government of this Commonwealth, as it is declared by this Parliament.

I trust my past Carriage hitherto, hath manifested my acquiescence in the Will and Disposition of GOD, and that I love and value the peace of this Commonwealth much above my own concerns; and I desire that by this, a measure of my future Deportment may be taken, which through the assistance of GOD shall be such, as shall bear the same witness, having I hope in some degree learned rather to reverence and submit to the hand of GOD, than to be unquiet under it. And (as to the late Providences that have fallen out amongst us) however, in respect of particular Engagements that lay upon me, I could not be active in making a change in the Government of the Nations, yet, thorow the goodness of GOD, I can freely acquiesce in it, being made, and do hold my self self obliged, as (with other men) I expect Protection from the present Government, so to demean my self with all peaceableness under it, and to procure to the utmost of my power, that all, in whom I have any Interest, do the same.

Richard Cromwell.

Fleetwood voted Commander in chief of all the Forces.

A Schedule of his Debts was annexed to this Paper: what was contracted for the Funerall of his Father, they absolutely rejected, and made slow Progress in the rest, and delayed to settle any Revenue upon him or his Mother, as was desired; but gave him two thousand pounds to discharge part of his own private debts, and required him, and all his Dependents, to remove from White-Hall in six dayes. Fleetwood discover'd a little discontent at this contempt put upon his Brother Cromwell, and that Family; but as soon as it was order'd that he should be Commander in chief of all the Armies and Land Forces in England, Scotland, and Ireland, for one year, in compliance with the 11th Article of the Armies Petition and Address, he was less solicitous in the concerns of his Wives Family: when the House voted he should command the Armies, they likewise voted, he should have power to Sign and Seal such Commissions, for the Constitution of Officers under him, as should be approved by the Parliament, and nominated by Sir Henry Vane, Sir Arthur Hestrig Lieutenant Gen. Fleetwood, and the Colonels Lambert, Desborow, Ludlow, and Berry, or the major part of them, who were made Commissioners for that purpose. And for his better Establishment, directed a Bill to be prepared and brought into the House to be passed into an Act for his constitution: Which was done accordingly; but upon the second reading of it, they would not admit of that clause, to authorize him to Sign Commissions, but Ordered, That all Commissions, both to the Commission Officers of the Army, and the Captains of the Fleet, should be Signed by the Speaker of the Parliament of the Common-wealth of England, to be written by the Clerks attending the Council of State, and delivered to the Officers gratis, by the Speaker in the Parliament House. They also at the same time, Ordered, That the Government of Ireland should be by Commissioners nominated and appointed by Parliament, and not by one Person, and that Colonel Henry Cromwell should be acquainted with the Order, and required forthwith to repair to the Parliament. This Gentleman had made himself very popular in Ireland, in his Government of that Kingdom, under his Father, and his Brother; but in regard there was a Council co-ordinate with him in civil matters, many of the members whereof were of severe and rigid behavior, the generosity of his disposition was somewhat over-ruled; nevertheless, most people in distress there, did receive such effects of his civility, where he had any manner of Capacity to shew it, That they acknowledged he deserv'd to have been the Sonne of a better Father.

He had the Irish Army under good Discipline; and was so well belov'd of the Officers, that it is probable he would not have consented to the change of Government, if he had had time to prepare against it; For his Brother gave him no intimation of what had happen'd, nor any Commands to appear on his behalf; what he had heard, being onely from the intelligence of private Friends. At the first Alarm, he advis'd with his Confidants what to do, and to prevent Considerations against him, by any Combinations of the Officers of his Army, he commanded all of them to their charges, and (to use his own words) not to hearken to any design of innovation, how speciously soever the same might be presented to them. Likewise he dispatched Colonel Monck to Scotland to Gen. Monck, (who came thither not till 15. dayes after the alteration of Government) to inform himself how he and his Army stood affected to it; who return'd no other answer than a Copy of the Letters, the Officers of his Army had obliged him to send to the Parliament.

In all probability, if Col. Henry Cromwell had drawn his Army together, and fix'd them to his Authority, and then declared against their proceedings at London, he might have shaken much the new foundation of the Common-wealth, for the Armies in England and Scotland were not then modelled, and the Officers many of them (as hath been said) relations or dependents of the Family of the Cromwells, but he was so doubtful of the success that he undertook nothing, but peaceably submitted; his Brother had done, (though in more generous terms) to the Authority then introduced.

We purp'ly omit many particulars of these transactions; and others in the Journals of the Parliament, as their constitution of a Council of State, for the more immediate executive power of the Common-wealth, the Nomination of Judges, Commissioners of the Great Seal, and Commissioners for the Admiralty, and Government of the Navy, and Colonel Henry Cromwell's Letter to the Parliament, when he submitted to it, as not very essentially pertinent to this History.

Fleetwood and his Friends were troubled at the revocation of his Commission, yet he dissembled his passion, and yielded to necessity, till a more favourable conjunction might give him opportunity to enlarge his power: however, both he, Desborow, Lambert, and many of them were dissatisfied with the way of receiving their Commissions from the hands of the Speaker, and would have remonstrated against it, but by enquiring into the temper of the inferior Officers, they found them well enough affected towards it, and therefore did not proceed for that time. And Fleetwood himself to dissemble his acquiescence with great submission, and Protection of Obedience to the Parliament, receiv'd his Commission in the House, from the hands of the Speaker, and after him Lambert, Desborow, Berry, Ludlow, Sydenham, and the rest of them in and about London, who had Commands in the Army.

A The Parliament now became confident of its Power, and meditated to subject the Army wholly to it (which made them jealous of each other.) Although all the Armies and Navy had declared their concurrence in obedience to them; yet they displaced those Officers in both, whom they suspected in any manner to have been affected to Cromwell, or Monarchical Government. The seven Commissioners before named, to whom the nomination of the Officers of the Army was first committed, were continued in that Authority, and very active in it. Those of the Anabaptist persuasion, were by them esteemed most firm to a Common-wealth, and by their information, they were much guided in the disposition of Places, but where any had been put out by Cromwell, for disaffection to him, they were restor'd as of course. Col. Lockart the Governour of Dunkirk, had made his submission; but shortly after, there was a desperate Mutiny in the Garrison, at first suspected to be for the King, but it was quickly appeas'd, and found to be otherwise. And the better to regulate affairs there, and quiet the place, Lieutenant Col. Pierston, Col. Ashfield, and Col. Packer, are forthwith sent over. Thus all things succeeded fortunately to them, Ambassadors from all parts making hast to congratulate the felicity of their Government.

The Ambassador from the United Provinces, was prepared with his Credentials for Audience within a fortnight after the first beginning of this New Common-wealth, and at his Audience, in the name of his Masters, he made a more than ordinary Profession of Amity, and desire of Unity and Confederacy with them. The Commissioners who had that in charge, made great dispatch both in Modelling the Army and Navy. Pierston and Mason, two Anabaptists, Lieutenant Colonels under General Monck, undertook to know so well the Army in Scotland, that their information was much credited in the settling of it, and to weaken Monck's power, they had designed to remove those he most trusted, and put others of their own Creatures into their places. Of all these passages, the General had very good Intelligence, his Agent Clarges not omitting to acquaint him with all that pass'd with these Commissioners. And after a while, he took publick notice of it in a Letter to the House, in which, amongst other Expressions, he told them he had heard of their intentions to displace many of his Officers, which he conceiv'd they did not from any knowledge they had of their Persons or Qualifications, but the informations of others; and that he thought himself as fit to be credited in that matter as any, and did assure them, they were all honest and stout men, and such for whose fidelity and good behaviour he would be engaged.

This Letter put a little stop to their Carriere, but did not divert their Resolutions: yet to give him some satisfaction, they sent him back word, they would be very careful in the placing or displacing of his Officers, and that in his own Regiment of Horse and Foot, there should be no alteration, till such time as he were consult'd in it. Monck was not satisfied with their Answer, but privately advis'd some of those Officers, whom he heard they would put from their Commands, to go to London, to solicit their own concerns, and as much as they could obstruct and retard the proceedings of the Committee. That which was of most advantage to the preservation of his Officers, was an Order made, That such Officers as were now Constituted for Scotland or Ireland, because they could not come to the Parliament to take their Commissions, should receive them from such Commissioners as should be appointed for the Civil Government of those Kingdoms respectively. And none being yet appointed for Scotland, that Affair rested a while in silence, yet was not so far neglected as to hinder the designment of the remove of many, whom nevertheless the General under-hand kept still in their Commands, till further order.

In the pretended Parliament begun at Westminster, in the Year 1656. an Act had pass'd for a three years Assesment upon England, Scotland and Ireland, at 35000 li. per mensum on England, 6000 per mensum on Scotland, and 9000 a month on Ireland, to determine the 24th of June 1660. of which one years proportion was yet uncollected, which made the House to passe an Act on the 18th of June this year, to authorize the collecting of that money, knowing it to be less difficult to continue a Tax already impos'd, than after the expiring of that, to raise a new one. In this Act, they appoint the whole Years Assesment to be paid in to the Treasury, on, or before the 10th day of August, and the other on the 10th of October.

Having as aforesaid, recall'd Colonel Henry Cromwell from Ireland, they appoint for the Civil Government of that Kingdom certain Commissioners, namely Steele, Robert Goodwin, Matthew Thomlinson, and John Jones; and for the Command of the Army, Colonel Edmond Ludlow, who with the Title of Lieutenant General, was immediately upon receipt of his Commission dispatch'd away.

In the mean time, the Kings Commissioners were not idle in engaging as many as they could for his Service; and Captain Tim was sent by his Majestie to Treat with Major General Brown, and such others in the City of London as he knew to be well inclin'd to his Interest. When he came to London and sent to Brown, he refus'd to have any Communication with him, and therefore he used the mediation of Mr. Charlton, and Mr. Beverly of Lincoln-Inn to Treat with him, and they had several Conferences without any effect; for he being a Prudent wary man, was unwilling to hazard himself, till he saw some Body of Men together, to busie the Army, and divert the Forces in London and Westminster. Tim then address'd himself to Mr. Mordant, and the rest of his Majestie's Commissioners; and was very assiduous to them. So active were these Commissioners, that most of the Nobility and Gentry of England and Wales were engaged by them, and a day in July fix'd for the Raising. Sir George Booth was to raise Lancashire and Cheshire, Sir Thomas Middleton, Shropshire and Flintshire. Sir John Carter, Denbighshire. The Earl of Stratford, General Monck digests not the Justs Designs of Modelling his Army.

He useth his utmost industry to obstruct it.

venhorp, and Mr. Fanhall, Hantsfordshire. Mr. Mordant, Sir Francis Vincent, and Sir Adam Brown, Surrey; with many more in all places too long to name.

The first Rising was to be of such as had never engaged on the Kings side in the late Wars, thereby to draw the Army to leis opposition; for the Declaration had no mention of his Majesty, but was call'd, The Declaration of the Lords, Gentlemen and Citizens, Freeholders and Yeomen, in this once happy Nation. The words of it were theic:

The Declaration of Sir George Booth emitted at the time of his Rising.

Since it hath pleased Almighty God to suffer the spirit of Division to continue in this distracted Nation, and to leave us without any settled Foundation, of Religion, Liberty, and Propriety, the Legislative Power usurped at pleasure, and contemned; The Army raised at first for our Defence abused, and mis-led into unwarrantable Actions by the Cunning and Ambition of some of the Superiour Officers; No Face of Government appearing either in any single Person, or a Body of Men in Council lawfully Constituted, to whom the Grievances of the People may with any probability of Success be properly addressed. Therefore We being Conscious of our Duty, and sensible of our own and the Nations Ruine, if these Distractions continue, or issue in a more fixed oppression by some Settlement inconsistent with the Laws, Peace, and Interest of these Nations, have taken Arms in Defence of Our selves and all others who will partake with us in the Vindication and Maintenance of the Freedom of Parliaments against all Violence whatsoever, of the known Laws, Liberty, and Property of the Good People of this Nation, who at present groan under illegal, arbitrary, and insupportable Taxes and Payments unknown to our Ancestors. This being our Duty to GOD and to Man, and our only Design, We cannot despair of the Blessing of Him who gives Victory; nor of the cheerfull concurrence of all good People, nor of the undeceived part of the Army, whose Arrears and increase of future Pay, and advancement of high Command, We shall by all means procure, suffering no Imposition of force on any mans Conscience; And to this We doubt not but all honest English-men will say, Amen, Amen.

Sir George Booth's Rising aided by the Kings Friends
from all Parts.

But yet many of the Kings Friends in all parts were to bring in their Aids, Colonel Richard Arundel and Trelawny undertook if his Majesty would bring 500 Horse into Cornwall, and Arms for as many more, they would raise the other 500: And Major General Egerton did as much in Staffordshire; and many others in other Parts. The Preparation could not be expedited with that haste as was intended, so that the day of Rising was deferred to the first of August, and Mr.
Cooper was sent by Mr. Mordant to his Majesty, to acquaint him with it; who was to soon dispatch't, but he returned in five dayes to those that sent him, to let them know, his Majesty would be present with them in a short time: With him Colonel Roger Whitley came into England, with some verbal Instructions to Sir George Booth, and some blank Commissions to disperse in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Flintshire; He staid no longer in London, than to receive Mr. Mordant's Commands, and some of the foremention'd Declarations to carry with him to Booth. Captain Tims was sent to the King, to let him know, all was ready: His Majesty thereupon remov'd privately from Brussels to Calais, about the first of August, which was two dayes after Tims came to him:
He had in his Company only the Marquess of Ormond, the Earl of Bristol, Dr. Quartermaine, Mr.
Daniel O'neal, and one Maurice Delaval, a Servant of the Marquess of Ormonds, with two other Servants, one belonging to the Earl of Bristol, and the other to O'Neil; nor did they Travel thir-er together, but by two and two: His Majesty had only Dr. Quartermaine with him, and the first place he came to from Brussels, was a little Village, where Monsieur Marfin met him, with whom he had much discourse about his Affairs; The place was to ill accommodated with Lodgings, that they could have but one bed, which the King would needs compell Marfin to accept, and he himself being contented with straw. Marfin accompanied his Majesty to St. Omers, where they parted; and then he went directly to Calais, where the rest met him; but to avoid being known, they dispersed into several Lodgings, and his Majesty had with him only Maurice to wait on him.
The Dukes of York and Gloucester were at Breda, and were sent for to Brussels, but they arrived not till the day the King parted from thence, and that after he was gone. The Duke of York with Tims followed his Majesty to Calais, but the Duke of Gloucester by his Majesties appointment continued at Brussels, ready prepared to come over upon the first intimation. The King staid three dayes at Calais, and a Shallop was ready at Boloign for his Transportation into Kent, upon the first News of any considerable Party's being in Arms.

The Duke of
from Breda.

The main of the Design prevented by discovery.

But in the height of this Expectation, one Mr. Baron arrives from Mordant with the ill News of the disappointment of much of the Design in all the South and West Parts of England, which was thought to be discover'd by a Letter intercepted at Reading from the Lady Mary Howard, about the latter end of July; but it was known long before that Letter, to Scott and some few other

other Members of the Council of State, which hastned them so much in a more than usual Care in modelling the Army, and settling the whole Militia of the Kingdom, wherein the meanest Commission Officer in any of the Trained Bands, Troops, or Companies, was to be approv'd in Parliament; and they had privately laid a contrivance to have Sculdiers at most of the Risings of the Kings Friends all over England: So that their accidentall intercepting of the Lady Mary Howards Letter by the officious diligence of a Post-Master, was rather a service than a disadvantage to his Majesty, since thereby his coming to England, which might have expos'd his Person to inevitable Perill, was prevented. Notice of this discovery could not be soon enough dispersed to prevent the appearance of many Gentlemen in divers parts. The Earl of Leitchfield, with Sir Adam Brown, my Lord Mordant, (so we now stile him, in regard he here first declar'd his having receiv'd the Dignity of Viscount) and about 25 others Rendezvouz'd near Guisford in Surry, but by reason of the taking of Sir Francis Vincent an active Servant of the Kings, there was so little appearance, that all divided to shift for themselves: The Earl of Leitchfield and my Lord Mordant came disguised by Water in the Common Barge from Chertsey to London, and got privately to Alderman Robinson's house, where they were for a while concealed.

The most considerable Body that got together, was under Sir George Booth, who with the Earl of Derby, the Lord Killmurry, and Major General Egerton, were met at the time appointed at Warrington, at first with a small Party, they having of the very Flow'r of the Gentry and Gallantry ingag'd among them, and their numbers encreased every minute: Colonel Roger Whitley deliver'd his Message to Sir George from his Majesty, and the Declarations he had received from the Lord Mordant, with an Account of his Majesties Preparations beyond the Seas, and his readiness to come over upon the first notice; which was no small Satisfaction and Joy to the whole Party, which then consisted of about Five hundred men. The first thing they resolv'd, was to march towards Chester, and the first night they marched to a place call'd Tradnam where they met Colonel Werden, who assur'd them, that the Gates of Chester would be open'd to them. And the next day they marched thither, and took possession of the Town, but the Castle was defended against them by Crockett the Governour thereof for the Parliament, who had one Company in it. The next day Major General Egerton was sent with a party to Chirk-Castle, where Sir Thomas Middleton hearing of his approach, opened the Gates, and joyfully received him. The next day he went with them to Wrexham, (having left his Son to Command the Castle for the King) and there, many came in to them. The next day after, Colonel Whitley was sent with a Party to put a Garrison into Hardinge Castle in Flintshire, which was newly left by a party of the Parliaments Souldiers that marched from thence to Denbigh Castle their next Garrison, but were seized by the County, and brought prisoners to Sir George Booth's Party. Colonel Ireland at the same time declared for them in Liverpool, and Mr. Brooks, one of the present Members of the Junto House of Commons, willing to expiate his former mistakes, cordially joyned with them for the Freedom of his Country, and met at the first Rendezvouz.

The Junto somewhat apprehensive of these proceedings, cause all the Horses in and about London to be seiz'd, and all the Avenues to the City to be Guarded, and divers Troops and Companies to be placed in all the Wayes toward the West and North-West Parts. They had every hour news of the dispersing of several little Parties, and Lambert was order'd with a Brigade to march to suppress Sir George Booth and his Party. The Lord Mordant as the most active Agent for his Majesty was summon'd on a great penalty to appear; and Mr. Edmund Dunch and Brooks, two Members of the Junto, whom they suspected to be ingag'd for the King, were on the penalty of a hundred pounds apiece required to attend the service of the House.

Mr. Nicholas Monk, a Reverend Minister, a Person of most firm Loyalty to his Majesty, and the only Brother to General Monk, came at this time to London in his way to Scotland, from Sir Hugh Pollard, Sir Thomas Stinkely, and others of his Majesties Friends in the West of England.
His business was to ingage his Brother in his Majesties Cause to promote the present Design, being directed to receive further Instructions from Sir John Greenville. He came directly to Mr.
Charges before he saw any one, and communicated his business to him, and afterwards to Green-will, who much encouraged his undertaking, and shew'd him two Letters he had received from his Majesty, one to General Monk, and the other to himself; which may not be impertinent to this History to be here inserted, to manifest the great Vigilance of his Majesty, whose eye was in every place where he had any prospect of assistance to his affairs. That to Monk was as followeth:

Mr. Monk a Minister sent into Scotland, to sollicite his Brother the Generall to the embracing his Majesties Interest.

SIR,

I cannot think you wish me ill, for you have no reason to do so; and the good I expect from you, will bring so great a benefit to your Country, and to your self, that I cannot think you will decline my Interest. The Person who gives or sends this to you, hath Authority to say much to you from me; and if you once resolve to take my Interest to heart,
I will leave the way and manner of declaring it, intirely to your own Judgment;
And will comply with the Advice you shall give me. The rest I refer to the person who conveys this to you; and it is in your power to make me as kind to you, as you can desire, A and to have me always

Your affectionate Friend,

CHARLES R.

July the 21. 1659.

The other was to Sir John Greenwill of the same date, in these words; Viz.

His Majesties
Letter to Sir
John Greenwill.

I Am confident that George Monk can have no Malice in his Heart against Me; nor hath he done any thing against Me which I cannot easily pardon; and it is in his power to do Me so great Service, that I cannot easily Reward, but I will do all I can; and I do Authorize you to Treat with him, and not only to assure him of my Kindness, but that I will very liberally Reward him with such an Estate in Land, and such a Title of Honour as himself shall desire, if he will declare for me, and adhere to my Interest: And whatsoever you shall promise to him on my behalf, or whatever he, or you by his Advice, shall promise to any of his Officers, or the Army under his Command, (which Command he shall still keep) I will make good and perform upon the word of a King.

CHARLES R.

Mr. Monk Negociates with
Mr. Clarges about the fore-said business.

Greenwill earnestly pressed to have Clarges engaged, and Mr. Monk moved it to him, with a promise of a great advantage from his Majesty upon his Restoration. Clarges replied, That he needed not these temptations to oblig him to his Duty; and refused to have any Discourse concerning those Matters with Sir John Greenwill at that time, well knowing, that the least jealousy of his actions from those in power, might make him useless for that future Service which could not be done without him.

Clarges secretly conveys Mr.
Monk on Shipboard for his Transportation
into Scotland.

But because all the Wayes to Scotland were obstructed, he took care to provide a Frigate for the Transporting of Mr. Nicholas Monk thither, and convey'd him safe on Shipboard, fully instructed how to manage his Negotiation: with Caution, and to communicate with none but the Generals, except Dr. Samuel Barrow Physician to the Army, a very discreet Gentleman, and Mr. John Price his Chaplain: The first of which was ejected out of Trinity College in Cambridge, for his affection to his Majesty; and the latter, the Son of a Sequestred Minister, always educated in Principles of Loyalty, a good Scholar, and an honest Man; both recommended by Clarges to the General at his first going into Scotland, to be near his Person.

His Majesty
removes privately from
Rouen.

The King when he received the News from the Lord Afordon of the disappointment of the Design, went from Calais to Bulloign, and from thence by easy Journeys, and very privately, to Rouen. The Duke of York, and Captain Titus stayed behind a while at Bulloign, and the Parts adjacent, to be ready upon all occasions if any thing should intervene. His Majesty at Rouen was in Consultation which way to move, when Dr. Alestrie came to him with the News of Sir George Booth's being in Arms, with Sir Thomas Middleton, and others with great Forces in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North-Wales, which put him in good hopes of Success. The first Rumour of this Rising represented it very formidable, for as much as his Majesty's Friends that lived at distance from it, were willing to receive it with the greatest advantage, so that the Numbers were believed to be much greater than they were, and by imagination advanced to what the willing Affections of the favourers of his Majesty's Cause would have them. His Majesty sent the Marquess of Ormond to Paris to Transact some affairs there, and went himself to St. Maloes by Caen, where he met the Earl of Bristol and Mr. O Neil.

Thence to St.
Males.

They at Westminster in the mean time were very active in dispatching Lambert on the Expedition against Booth, but first they issued forth a Proclamation to proclaim Major General Edgeron, Col. Robert Werden, Sir George Booth, Sir Thomas Middleton, and their adherents Traytors and Rebels, which was Commanded to be proclaimed in all Market Towns, and read in all Churches.

Major General
Massey, the Lord Hybryt, and others sent for the
cestershire.

Major Gen. Massey was very active in Gloucestershire, and it by an accident of the interception of a Letter his Design had not been ruin'd, he had certainly taken Gloucester; and what with his own Reputation in these Parts, and the assistance of the Lord Herbert of Worcester, Colonel Barrow, Captain Glaysford, and others of the Kings Friends, they would have got together above 3000 men, Miners and others, out of the Forest of Dean, and from about Stroud-Water, and other places. There was in Gloucester a Troop of the Army Horse under one Dale, and a Militia Troop commanded by one Crofts, who upon this Discovery caused 300 Foot to be presently raised, and sent a party of Horse to take the Lord Herbert, Massey, Barrow, and Glainsford: They took the Lord Herbert, and brought him to Gloucester; Barrow and Glaysford defended themselves in Barrow's House, and upon Parol, to render themselves at Gloucester, were not taken. Massey and his Servant being taken prisoners, Massey himself was set on a Horse, and a good stout Troop set behind him, to hold him in his Arms, two rode on each side, and some Troop pers before his Horse, and others behind: It was about the Close of the Night, the Evening very dark and Tempestuous with Rain and Hail, inasmuch, that when they were going down a very steep Hill by Nimsfield-Road, about ten miles miles from Gloucester, the way to Bath, Massey's Horse, with the man that rode behind him, fell headlong altogether, and tumbled down that steep Hill, whereby it hapned that the Fellow let go his hold, and molt of the rest also; so that all the Prisoners, except the Lord Herbert, and Massey's Servant, escaped.

The Junta sent to Dunkirk for three Regiments to strengthen the Army; and Colonel Zanchy brought out of Ireland his Regiment of Horse, and Astel's Regiment of Foot, which landing at Anglesey, marched to joyn with Lambers, who at his first march from London, had not above 1500, but by Conjunction of several Troops and Companies that met him, increased to about 5000 before he engaged; Sir George Booth having not half the number, and those he had without any Order or Discipline, especially because many of them, being Noble-men and Gentlemen of Quality, were not without great Emulation, every one aspiring to Command, whilst no body obey'd; Sir George Booth having Intelligence of Lambers drawing near to him, thought to have got a dayes march before him into Lancashire, to have increased his Numbers; and to gain time, he and Sir Thomas Middleton sent a Trumpeter, with two Ministers, to shew the ground of their raising an Army, and desired a Treaty, to save effusion of blood: To which Lambert agreed, on Condition they would first lay down their Arms, and surrender to him the Garisons in their power. To this there was no Reply; but some of Lambert's men pressed to hard the next morning upon Booth, that at a Bridge near Northwich, a sharp Encounter was made between the Forces of each Party. The Boothians, with much Courage, defended the Pass, till they were over-pow'd by Numbers. Capt. Morris, a gallant Loyal Gentleman, was kill'd, and some few others of Booth's Party; of Lambert's very few fell, and those that did of no great Note; all the vanquish'd dispers'd themselves. Sir George Booth, and Sir Thomas Middleton got away. The Lord Kilmurry, Brooks, Major General Edgeron, Sir William O Neile, and others, were taken prisoners, and all the Garisons immediately submitted to Lambert.

The Curious that made Remarques on this generous Undertaking, as commonly wiser in the Discourse than Execution of any great Design, did much censure the Conduct of it. They said, that they had many Opportunities to have ruin'd their Enemies, but omitted all; That Collonel Zanchy from Ireland landing in Anglesey, might have been met, and with good probability of Success fought with ere he could have joyn'd with Lambert, they being with all their Force betwixt him and them; and that Collonel Lilburn, who was gathering men together in York-shire, might easily, by any small Force kept on Foot in Lancashire, have been broken, and hindered in his Levies; and that many other little Parties, which in small numbers came from several Parts, might have been met and dispers'd, before they united; and that one Blow given to any one of them, would have added so much to their Reputation, that it might have brought great Accessions to their Party. Others (and perhaps with good reason) were of Opinion, that nothing was more destructive to his Majesty, than these Plots and Contrivances of Rising for him; and that the best Resolution he could have taken, since the end of the first Warre, was, to have fate in Expectation of some favourable Advantage to himself, from the Division of his Enemies; for what could new raised men do against experience and successful Soldiers? And where the late King with all his strength could not prevail, Parties could less expect to conquer; and indeed, the Event manifested the Truth of this Reasoning, for the Consequence of these Plots, was no other than the Ruine of many of the Estates of Noble-men and Gentlemen, the loss of some of their Lives, and the Depression of the Spirits of the rest; besides, an occasion of strengthening the Army so much the more, and giving their Party plausible Pretences, to infer a Necessity for their continuance, and to Levy Taxes on the People for their Maintenance, and unite and fix them the more against his Majesty. But nevertheless, the generosity of these noble Persons (to particularize any of them in a more eminent manner than any of the rest, would be to injure all) cannot be enough commended, since they valued no hazard, in respect of their Duty to their Sovereign, and the Vindication of the Laws and Liberty of their Country, and have left such an Example of Loyalty to their Posterity, as we hope will be maintain'd, as long as the Fame of their Vertues and Honour shall endure.

General Monk in Scotland, was so much prevail'd upon, by the Report of Sir George Booth's prosperous Success in his Enterprize, and the Impunity of his Brother Nicholas Monk, that he resolv'd to march into England, in pursuance of Booth's Declaration, which was very suitable to his own Inclinations.

He consulted in this Matter, besides his Brother, onely Major Ralph Knight, Major of his own Regiment of Horse, Captain Jeremiah Smith likewise of his own Regiment, Doctor Samuel Barrow Physician to the Army, Doctor John Price his Chaplain, and Dr. Thomas Gumble, then Chaplain to the Council of Scotland, in regard he had many Seditious Officers in his Army, who were Spies upon all his Actings, and therefore was oblig'd to be very wary and circumspect in his Proceedings; inasmuch, that when Colonel Atkins, a Royalist of his ancient Acquaintance, came into Scotland to him, about the same Errand that his Brother did, Monk (for fear of awakening the Jealousie of the Factions about him) durst not shew him any Countenance or Respect, but rather the contrary, sending him away somewhat discouraged: When all was ready for his March, and a Declaration to that end prepared, he demur'd for two days, upon the stop of the English Packets,

The King receives News thereof at St. Malo.

He begins to derive his chiefest hopes from the Peace between France and Spain.

Sir Henry Bennet Negotiates for his Majesty at that Treaty. His Majesty repairs thither himself.

And is Honourably entertained by the Spaniards. Lockhart at the same time Agent at this Treaty for the English Commonwealth. Is countenanced & favoured by Cardinal Mazarini.

G. Monk sends a Letter to the House, signifying his willingness to be dismissed from his Command.

The said Letter, through Clarges's perswasions, is kept off by the Speaker from being read.

in expectation of Intelligence from his Agent Clarges, from whom he two days after received the fatal News of the Defeat of Sir George Booth.

The King being till at St. Malo's, in preparation of a Vessel to transport him into England, had the first Notice of these Misfortunes from Mr. Brett, an English Benedictine Monk, which in a while after was confirm'd to him by the Marquess of Ormond, who came to him from Paris, with Particulars of it: The King (always present to himself in the most difficult Accidents of his Life) discover'd not much alteration at this, though it seem'd a Cross that might very well no less sensibly affect him, than what ever had yet happen'd to him in prosperous, and giving Check to his Fortune, because hereby all his hopes became desperate, of his being ever restor'd to his Subjects, without such Foreign Force, as should be able to afford Assistance and Supply to their Endeavors for him, by holding his Enemies so long in Play, till by accession of his Friends, they might be strong enough to resist their greatest Power and Force: yet even in this Reflection, he had many Doubts in his Mind, for that many late Successes of the English in Flanders, had made them seem invincible to those, from whom his Majesty was to expect Assistance. But since nothing now but Foreign Aid could visibly raise his Hopes, he resolv'd seriously to apply himself to the Treaty now in Agitation upon the Borders between France and Spain, about a Peace betwixt those two Crowns, which was managed by Cardinal Mazarini, and Don Lewis d' Haro, the two chief Ministers of the two Kings, to which his Majesty had an Eye long since, not doubting but he should be in some measure comprehended in it, so as to receive Assistance from those Princes his Allies, as soon as they should be freed from their Embarrassments; and in prosecution hereof, he had commanded Sir Henry Bennet, a Person of great Prudence and Address, his Ambassador Resident in Spain, not to fail to attend Don Lewis d' Haro to the Treaty, and be present there to negotiate his Affairs. The Treaty being near Conclusion, his Majesty, for fear it should be ended before he came thither, made all possible haste to repair to those Parts; and in order thereunto, took his Journey forthwith from St. Malo's to Reims, where he met Sir George Carteret, and after some small stay with him, went from thence to Nanterre, and there his Company divided, till they met again at Thoulouze, from whence he went by the Passage of Oleron, over the Pyrenean Hills, to Saragosa, the chief City in Aragon, and there he continued eight or nine days, and dispatched Mr. Onslow to Fontarabia, to inform himself of what pass'd at the Treaty; who, when he came thither, after some Conference with Bennet, they agreed to halt away Mr. William Dugan, an Irish Gentleman, to the King, to let him know, the Treaty was prolong'd, and that his Presence would very much quicken and advance his Affairs. His Majesty then immediately hastening by Post to Fontarabia, continued inognito, as he had done all this Journey, till he came within three Leagues of Fontarabia, where he was attended by Bennet with Coaches, to augment his Equipage; and from thence he resum'd his State, and went in Publick.

He was met by the Baron of Batteville, a Person of great Honour and Civility (Governour of Fontarabia) with a Troop of Horse, a mile and a half without the Town; and when he came near it, all the Guns were discharged, and Don Lewis himself met him within the Gate. During his stay there, he was entertain'd in as splendid a manner, as the time and place would handsomely admit. And during the Treaty, he had frequent Conferences with Don Lewis d' Haro, and was every day visited by him.

The Governing Power in England, employ'd at the same time to attend on Cardinal Mazarini at this Treaty, and to promote their Concerns, Lockhart, who had continued ever since Oliver's Death Extraordinary Ambassador in France. The Cardinal lay at St. John de Luz, the nearest Town to Spain, on the French Borders, where he shew'd so much Countenance and Respect to Lockhart, that the King thought it not decent to give him a Visit; but he received many from divers of the French Nobility.

General Monk was inwardly very much troubled at these Disasters; and the more, because he found himself every day more and more incapable to remedy them: for the House displac'd Col Daniel, the Governour of St. Johnston, and many other Officers, whom he much trusted, and were about to remove the rest: so that seeing which way things were likely to tend, and thinking it better to resign of his own accord, than to be worm'd out of his Command, or at least remain but like the Image of a General, and serve only for a property to other Mens Designs, he sent a Letter upon the Third of September, to Lenthall the Speaker, to be communicated to the Parliament, to desire a Dismission from his Command; pretending, That he was infirm in his Health, and had long continued in that remote Country; And therefore requesting, now that all Insuperable Disturbances to the Peace of the Nations were allay'd, he might be permitted to return into his own Country, to end his days in quiet.

This Letter, though it was not sent to Clarges to be deliver'd, as usually all his Packets were, because he suspected he would have oppos'd that Resolution of his, and been very backward and dilatory in the delivery of the Letter; yet Mr. Nicholas Monk giving him Intimation of it, the Matter was so order'd, that the Letter came to his hands, and was by him deliver'd to the Speaker, with whom he dealt so effectually, that he agreed to delay the offering it to be read for ten days, till a Packet came from Scotland to contradict it: Yet Clarges was put to great perplexity in this Business, for Vane, Salway, and those that affected not, or suspected the General (having private Advice of this Letter) often call'd to have it read; And had not earnest and dextrous prevention been us'd, to divert the House with other Business, by some that lov'd the General well, and were

A prepar'd by Clarges, he had by this Dispendency rendred himself incapable of doing that, for which he seem'd by Providence especially chosen and mark'd out.

The Defeat of Sir George Booth and his Party, heighten'd much the Spirits of the chief Officers of the Army, who began now to contrive how to restore the Military Power to its former Greatness, which was somewhat of late lessen'd by the Parliament, to call's and in Designation to be wholly subjected to them. To effect this, there was a strict and private Correspondence between some of the Officers at London, and Lambert, and those with him in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Parts adjacent. The Difficulty was, how to engage the inferior Officers (who were somewhat affected with their immediate Dependence on the House, by receiving Commissions from the Hands of the Speaker) to obviate this. It was advis'd, to attempt nothing at the General-Council of Officers in London: but to begin with those of Lambert's Brigade, as most exalted by their late good Fortune, and therefore apter to be seduc'd by any plausible Advantages of Power. These therefore were all conven'd to the Number of Fifty at Derby, the 16th of September. The first thing on which they began their Debate, was the Constitution of the Army; the Unity, Discipline, and Conduct whereof, they said was invaded by a Party of Neuters and Malignants: They complain'd of several Milcarriages in the Civil Administrations of Government, and of the Inactivity and Backwardness of Persons in Authority and Trust in the Counties, and the Defection of many Corporations, both which appear'd in the time of the late Insurrection. They also seem'd much to resent the Parliament's unwillingness, to prosecute the Proposals of the Army at their first sitting, as an Expedient for Settlement, with many other things of like Concernment. These things were artificially insinuated into the Minds of the inferior Officers, who were easily enough drawn to an Opinion of their own Power, and to think themselves qualified to give Laws to all but themselves.

However, these Matters were at first only Treated of in General, It being moved and agreed, that Colonel Zanchy, Colonel Michel, Major Creed, and some few others, should meet as Commissioners for the rest, to reduce them into Form, which was accordingly done. Lambert himself went privately to London, and Lieutenant-Colonel Duckenfield, a great Creature of his, presently followed, to acquaint the General Council of Officers with these Proceedings; and shortly after the whole Matter being digested into the Form of a Petition, was sent up in a Letter inclosed, to Colonel Ashfield, Colonel Cobbet, and Duckenfield; by whom, or any one, or more of them, it was to be deliver'd to Fleetwood, to be communicated to the General Council of Officers: And at the same time, when this was sent to London, an Officer was dispatch'd with a Duplicate of it to Gen. Monk, and a Letter with it, to desire his Concurrence, and that the Officers of his Army might join with them: which Letter was subscribed by 14 of the chief Officers employ'd under Lambert.

Sir Arthur Haslerig had secret Intimation of these Consultations at Derby; and the next day after the Petition came to London, which was on the 22 of September, he moved the Parliament, at their first Sitting, against it, exclaiming with much earnestness against the Officers of the Army, who (he said) were attempting alterations in the Government, to the setting up a Single Person over them.

This put the House into a Jealousie of Lambert; to whom, in their private Discourses, they attributed the whole Contrivance; and though he outwardly appear'd passive in it, they said he aspir'd to succeed Cromwell: And because it was not yet time to effect his purpose in his own Person, he would set up Fleetwood to be General of the Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and establish himself in the next Command to him, to be thereby able, with less Envy, to compass his Ends. For Fleetwood, they said, was of an easy nature, and would be contented with the Name of General, allowing Lambert the Power of it, till he should find a fair Occasion, to assume it in his own Right; and when he should have so gotten the Sword, he would not long want the Scepter.

Fleetwood confessed he had the Copy of a Petition, but seem'd much perplex'd at Haslerig's laying such an imputation on the Officers of the Army, and endeavour'd to justify their Innocence, as intending nothing less than what was alledged, but all he said could not allay the heat rais'd by Haslerig, inasmuch that they Order'd, That Ashfield, Cobbet, and Duckenfield, whom he assum'd to have the Original in their hands, should that afternoon attend the House with it, and appointed Haslerig to give them notice thereof, and to bring with him the Copy he had. Monk made no Progress in Scotland in this Affair, nor did he think fit to call together his Officers about it; but some of them that were Anabaptists attempted privately to get Subscriptions, till they heard of the severe Reflection that was made upon it by the House: Whom in the Afternoon, the three Officers mentioned attended with their Petition: And because it was That, on which the chief Foundation was laid of that difference betwixt the Remnant Parliament and Army, which ended in the Dissolution of both, and was never yet Printed, We have thought it material enough to set here word for word inferred.

The Army began to contrive the recovery and advancement of their Power.

Consultations among the Officers of the Army, promoted by Lambert, in dislike of some Milcarriages of the Junta.

Their Desire concluded to be drawn up into the Form of a Petition.

Haslerig vehemently opposeth the Army's Proceedings.

And possesseth the House against them. The Junta's Censure of Lambert, in reference to this Business.

Fleetwood endeavour'd to justify the Officers of the Army, but in vain.

Ashfield, Cobbet, and Duckenfield attend upon the House with this Petition.

1659.

To the Supreme Authority of these Nations, the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, &c.

The Humble Petition and Proposals of the Officers under the Command of the Right Honourable the Lord Lambert in the late Northern Expedition.

HUMBLT SHEWETH,

The Tenor of the Army's
Proposals.

That whereas we, with others who desire to fear the Lord in those Nations (though by our provocation we were ripe for destruction), have been again saved by the Lord, and have had a late view of his appearance as of old, in the beholding of whose gracious Footsteps, as we cannot but rejoice, so our selves tremble, lest the fruit of all (which the Lord may expect, and his People long earnestly for) become abortive now in the day of our deliverance; We therefore present unto your Honours Consideration these ensuing Proposals, which we humbly lay before you:

1. That the Humble Petition and Address of the General Council of Officers at Wallingford-House to the Parliament, which was so unanimously and cheerfully agreed to, and approved of, in a day of our greatest Confusions, may not be laid asleep, but may have fresh life given unto it; It being upon farther and clearer grounds still upon our hearts, as the best and only Expedient yet offer'd (notwithstanding many Essays) to a happy and durable Settlement, being a fixed and firm Fence and Boundary (under God) for the securing the Civil and Spirituall Liberties which the Spirit of the Nation is unwearied in travell, not only to invade, but upon every opportunity (as we have often seen, and lately had a clear evidence of) is ready to attempt the ruine and destruction of the same.

2. That whereas God having given a spirit to the Army fixed and faithful to the Interest of his People, and Our good Cause, when many who had been Friends were either Apostates, Malignants, or Neuters, Joyning with the old Enemy, leaving the Parliament and Army, and their few active Friends singly to Confront with their late difficulties; And having now no such hopeful way like to prevail to ruine and frustrate what we have so long contested for, as by working divisions in the Army, making breaches, begetting mis-understandings, and dissolve its Unity, wherein, under God, its greatest strength lies, we do therefore, as the most effectuall means for the maintaining the Discipline and Conduct thereof, and preserving its Unity inviolable, Humbly Propose, That his Excellencie the Lord Fleetwood may be settled Commander in Chief of the Armies (his Commission expiring within a few Months); That the Lord Lambert be the General Officer and Chief Commander of the Army next, and under him; And also, that the Lord Desborough be the chief Officer of the Horse under them: And that Generall Monk be the Chief Officer and Commander of the Infantry: They being all Persons under whose Conduct, Courage, and Fidelity, we have had Eminent Success, Victory, and Deliverance, in the dayes of greatest Straights, and have been signally blessed and owned by the Lord; to whom, and not to Man, be the Honour of all.

3. That having had very sad experience of a grand Apostatizing spirit gone through the Nations, and amongst many of those who were intrusted for the Safety thereof, very few atting or appearing in several Counties, for the preventing the Plots, and suppressing the power of the Enemy in the late Rebellious Design, and many others not only flatterings, but falling in with them, whereby a totall ruine was threatened, and had been effected, had not the Lord in Mercy prevented; We therefore humbly Propose, That there may be a diligent enquiry in all parts, by faithfull men employed to that purpose, what intrusted persons have been guilty of any Contrivance, and acted against the Commonwealth-Interest, and that they may be proceeded against accordingly. And likewise what persons upon wicked purposes have been Neutrall in such a distressed day, when their Assistance according to their Employments and Trusts, would have been not less usefull then seasonable, and that all such may be removed from their Places and Employment, Civil and Military; and that such who on the contrary in this juncture of the discomposed Affairs, declared their owning of this Interest either in the County Troops or Militia Volunteers, or otherwise, may be looked on as Friends, encouraged, satisfied their Arrears, protected from Injuries, countenanced by you, and as they are capacitated, intrusted with Authority in their severall Countries.

4. That in the late Insurrections, some considerable Corporations have not only aided, abetted, and countenanced the Enemies Design, but have also made use of the Arms lodged with them, and themselves appeared in the Rebellion, willingly receiving the numerous accession of all engaged therein: Therefore We humbly Propose, That such Corporations may be discountenanced, and that You would be pleased to give Your Signall mark of disfavours against them; As also for the future, so to regulate Corporations, That such persons well Qualified according to the Government of a well Constituted Commonwealth, may be intrusted with Authority of Magistracy in every of the severall Towns; That so the Footsteps of Monarchy may be rooted out.

5. We humbly offer, That all Persons who sever, Magistrates, Ministers, or others, who have openly or secretly stirred up or provoked the Inhabitants of these Nations to War and Comotions against the Parliament, and particularly to the late Insurrections, (of which is visibly apparent, many of them have not only been abettors, but in their persons appear'd with Instruments and weapons of War, as some of us know) may be proceeded against, as You in your Judgment shall think fit.

After the reading of this Paper, the House adjourned till the next Morning, and Ordered then to resume the Debate of it, and that no other business should intervene: And at their meeting, they Voted, That to have any more Generall Officers in the Army, than are already settled by the Parliament, is needless, chargeable, and dangerous, to the Commonwealth; and that Fleetwood shall acquaint them with this Resolve.

They had it under Consideration, to have imprisoned those that brought the Petition; but because the chief and most remarkable design of it, tended to set up some new General Officers in the Army, they thought it enough to declare against it.

Fleetwood the next day at a Meeting with many of the Leading Officers at his own House, informed them of the Parliaments displeasure signified in their late declarative Vote against the Petition and Proposals, and they thereupon resolved to decline the insisting thereon; but agreed, that some of their number should draw up somewhat in Writing of a more moderate nature, to be presented to the House, to profess an adherence to their Authority, in opposition to the King and his Party, (whom they styled, The Common Enemy) and that they would stand by them in the Settlement of the Commonwealth against all Disturbances whatsoever: And that this should be prepared and brought to be read and considered by a Generall Council of Officers to meet for that purpose the 27th of September, in the Chappell at Somerset-House.

And the said Petition was at the appointed time prepared and brought into the general Council by those to whom the care of framing it was committed, with a long preamble, and many Proposals far different from what was expected by many that were then present; for these seemed at their former meeting, to be a general fence and opinion, that they should humble themselves, for what they had before done, without the permission and consent of their Masters, and make some Declaration of their intention, never to interpose more in matters of Government. But contrary to this, they arraign'd them for what they had done against the Petition of Lamberts Brigade, and for what (they said) had been groundlessly and without cause alledged against them; and were so far from acknowledging their offences, thereby to recover the good opinion of the House towards them, that they justified their own proceedings with a kind of Reprehension of those that misinform'd the House concerning it. Colonel Okey, Colonel Hucker, Colonel Sanders, Major Daberon, Major Barton, and Major Bremau, with many others, did much oppose the carrying on of this Representation, which retarded the Progress of it. And some of the dissenting Officers writ to General Monck, and sent him a Copy of what was brought in, with all the debates thereupon, desiring him to employ his Credit with Fleetwood and Lambert, to put a stop to it; as if that which would, if not prevented put an irreparable breach betwixt the Parliament and the Army.

Monck was somewhat at a stand to know how to behave himself in this matter, but to avoid suspicion, he writ to Fleetwood a courteous Letter of his opinion of the whole affaire, but insisted chiefly on that part of the Petition wherein it was proposed, That no Officer or Souldier should be cashier'd or dismiss'd from their places, without a due proceeding at a Court-Martiall, or by his own consent, except in case of reduction or disbanding; desiring they would add (after the words Court-Martiall) or by order of the Commander in Chief of the Army upon the place, alledging, That although the removing or displacing of Officers or Souldiers, otherwise then by sentence of Court-Martiall, was a thing rarely practis'd: yet if a Generall, or the Supreme Authority, should be understood to be restrained therein, it might encourage the more inferior Officers and Souldiers to affront the Superior, and the Generall himself, and would in time make the Army a kind of separate Corporation from the Parliament.

This Letter came not to Fleetwood, till the greater part of the Officers had agreed to the Representation to be presented to the House. But Monck's intention was to make his advantage of this division, and to ascend, sent his Brother Nicholas to London to Clarges, to authorize him principally to acquaint such of the Members, as he thought most fit, That if they would assert their own Authority, he would march into England, to justify it against any opposition.

The Officers resolve upon more moderate Proposals.

Another Petition brought into the Council of Officers more high than the former.

During this Debate at London of the Generall Officers, all imaginable endeavours were used by the dissenters, to protract and lengthen the time; but they were by much over-numbered. And the Petition was Signed by 230. Commission-Officers of the Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland, who were then in and about London.

Orders made by the Junto of Common, for the encouragement of the Souldiers, the better to engage them to their Interest.

Orders for the sale of Hampton Court, Somerset-house, &c.

Describes words at the delivery thereof.

The leading Members had from time to time, notice of the Progress of this Petition, and the matter of it, so that to prevent the Officers of the Army, even in the most reasonable of their Demands. They made many Orders concerning Pay of the Souldiers, and Mariners, and Provision for the maimed Souldiers, and Orphans, and Widows of such as were kill'd in their Service. To the Souldiers they Ordered, That all the Arrears, as well of those of the Army, as the Militia Troops and Companies, should be paid out of the Moiety of such monies as should be raised by the Sale, or other disposition of the Estates of Delinquents Sequestred, and to be Sequestred upon the late Insurrection, and out of one moiety of money to be raised by the sale of Forrests and Chaces, excepting New Forrest, and the Forrest of Deane. And excepting such Timber and Trees as should be thought fit to be reserved and made use of, for the use of the Commonwealth, And to the Officers and Mariners of the Navy, They ordered the other moiety of the money to be raised upon Delinquents Estates. And also that Hampton-Court House, Parks, and Somerset-House (except the Chappel which was reserved for a French Congregation), and all other Mannors, Parks, Houses and Lands contained in the severall Acts for sale of the King and Queens Lands, should be sold, and the money go to that use. And for the maimed Souldiers, Orphans, and Widows, of such as were slain in their Service, They ordered the Committees formerly constituted for inspections into the Publique, to pay two months pay to them, and take care to put such of their Children to be Apprentices as were fit for it. They likewise to gain themselves the more generall Esteem, considered of some way to satisfie part of the Debts contracted to raise Arms against the King, at the beginning of the Warr, upon the Publique Faith of the Parliament, which had been long neglected; And in order thereunto, they ordered, that the other moiety of the money to be raised by the sale of the Forrests (except as aforesaid) should be employed towards the payment and satisfaction of those debts. The House imagined that these their proceedings, would so far satisfie the Generality of the Officers of the Army, as to divert them from the delivery of their Petition, and many of the most active members in credit with the leading men did what they could to hinder it, but could not prevail. And upon the 5th of October, Colonel Desborough, with many others, came to the door of the Parliament, and sent the Sergeant to inform the Speaker, that he, with some others of the Officers of the Army, attended with something to be presented to them, whereupon he was call'd in with those in his Company, and in the name of the rest, spoke these following words.

"I Am Ordered by the Generall Councell of the Army, with the rest of these Gentlemen, to wait upon you, to present unto you their Humble Representation and Petition; and they humbly desire you would accept it, as that which proceeds from the Hearts of those who desire nothing more than that the Lord would strengthen your hearts, in carrying on that good Work of settling these Nations upon the Foundation of a free Commonwealth, whereby the Religious and Civill Liberty of the good People thereof may be preserved and secur'd."

Having said this, he and those with him withdrew, and the Petition being deliver'd by the Sergeant at Arms attending, into the Speakers hands, was by his direction read. The Title was,

The substance of the Army's humble Representation, and Petition.

In the Preamble they set forth, That having had by their Order some late Votes of Parliament Communicated unto them by Lieutenants Generall Fleetwood their Commander in Chief, occasioned by a Debate in Parliament upon the Petition and Proposals of the Officers under the Command of the Lord Lambert in the late Northern Expedition; They have inquired diligently into their hearts and wages with reference thereunto, and finding nothing amongst them but Faithfulness and Integrity to the Parliament and Commonwealth, They are sensible that there have not wanted some Persons who have endeavoured to beget mis-understanding betwixt the Parliament and the Army, and to that end have represented their Actions and Intentions so, as it is taken for granted, that there hath been irregularity amongst them, at which they fear they have taken offence; Whereas if there had not been an antipathion, they are perswaded it would have appeared to all unprejudiced spirits, that neither they (who for the generality of them were ignorant (for to they pretended) of that whereat the offence was taken) nor their faithful Brethren of the Northern Brigade who signed the said Petition and Proposals, did design or intend any thing tending to the Interruption of the Parliament, the prejudice of the Peace of the Commonwealth, or any other by or sinister respect not becoming the Trust reposed in them. Wherefore being sensible of the Evill: that persons abroad may make from the least apprehensions of difference betwixt the Parliament and the Army; and that they may as much as in them lies, remove all occasions of surmise, Justifie their own own Innocency before them, and frustrate the expectations of any, who by blowing up the Coals of dissention, hope to warm themselves thereby; They have thought it their Duty to present their naked Thoughts to them, hoping they will find so much of Integrity and approved Faithfulness in them, for the welfare of the Commonwealth, as may continue a firm confidence of them, and engage their Zeal against all such as shall go about to reproach their Faithful Army, or any member thereof for the future, especially considering that the peace of these Nations depends much upon a Cordiall and affectionate Union of the Parliament and Army, and an uninterrupted good understanding of each other.

It could not rationally be believed, that these men could think this their manner of Proceeding suitable to the temper of Subjects to their Superiours, or that it could tend to any thing but that which they seem'd to avoid; namely, a Breach betwixt their Parliament and them: But a clearer manifestation of this, was apparent in their Proposals annexed to this Preamble, utter'd in with Four bold declaratory Assertions; of all which we shall insert the words themselves as they were presented. Where they say,

We do humbly and plainly declare,

1. That notwithstanding what any persons may suggest or say to the contrary, We are not for, but against the setting up of any Single Person whatsoever in Supreme Authority: The Army's Proposals. And for a demonstration hereof, We may appeal to your own Judgments, upon our late Actions, wherein since our Declaration of the Sixth of May last, We have with all Industry and faithfulness endeavoured to render our selves serviceable to you and the Commonwealth, and have cheerfully observed your Commands, some of us with our Lives in our hands in your late Service, wherein to our great encouragement the Lord hath once more appeared to own you and your Army, and the Good Old Cause for which we have contended. And at the late Return of this Parliament to the discharge of their remaining Trust, we did with simplicity and plainness, in our Humble Petition and Address presented to you, manifest our Hearts and Desires, and that with much unanimity and fullness of consent; which we apprehended was well accepted by you.

2. That we have not since changed our Principles, leading to a well regulated Commonwealth, wherein the Liberties of the People thereof both Spiritual and Civill may be fully secured, and Persons of known Integrity, Piety, and Ability employed in Places of Trust and Concernment; but resolve by the Assistance of God to remain constant to them: And make it our humble Prayer to God, That he would incline your hearts effectually to prosecute the same, and make you Instrumental in bringing forth such a Foundation of Government, whereby all the good People of these Nations may rationally expect that such Liberties and Rights shall be preserved to them and their Posterities. And we can truly say, That it is in our hearts earnestly to desire, that God would Crown you with the Honour of making these Nations happy by such a Settlement, as may not be liable at every Change of Governours to have the Peace thereof disturbed by introducing new Governments.

3. Whereas a Petition and Proposals were lately drawn up by the Officers of the Brigade that (under the Command of Major General Lambert) hazarded themselves in your Service with good success, whereby through the blessing of God upon them and others of your faithful Friends and Servants, the Peace of this Commonwealth is still continued: And the said Petition was sent up to some Officers here, to be presented to the Lord Fleetwood; which hath been by some interpreted to evil and sinister Ends, and from thence suggestions derived, as if there were Intentions to violate the Parliament, to set up a Single Person, or another Generall: In order thereunto, We do sincerely profess, (whatever the design of any persons may be to promote such Causeless Jealousies) We have had no other than Faithfulness and Candor in our Hearts and Actions towards the Parliament; nor do we apprehend (with submission we may speak it) any reason or cause of offence to be conceived against your Faithfull Servants, who lately gave so ample proof of their Fidelity and Courage.

4. We cannot but esteem our selves unhappy, to have been so misrepresented to the Parliament, as should occasion such a publique Admonition upon Record; And considering what Evil use may be made of these things by a Publique Enemy, and to the end they may be disappointed of their hopes, and all such persons discouraged as shall go about for the future to promote jealousies, or by mis-information to beget Divisions betwixt the Parliament and their Faithful Servants the Army: And that a good understanding may be preserved between them, We humbly Pray,

1. That the Officers of the Army, and particularly those who have reason to bear the marks marks of Your Favour for their Faithfulness in the late Northern Expedition, may A stand right in Your Opinion, and have your Countenance.

2. That whatsoever person or persons shall for the future groundlessly and Causelessly inform the House against your Servants, thereby creating Jealousies, and casting scandalous Imputations upon them, may be brought to Examination, Justice, and Condign Punishment.

3. That it being an undoubted Right of the People to have a Liberty in a peaceable and submissive way, to Petition the Supreme Authority, which Liberty hath been by Your selves Asserted, allowed and approved of; we cannot but also assert the said Liberty, and humbly conceive, that your Faithfull Servants of the Army have no way forfeited their Rights as Freemen, and that therefore they hope it will be no offence for them to submit B their humble Desires to the Parliament.

4. That You would be pleased to take into Your serious Consideration, the necessitous Condition of the poor Souldiers of Your Armies, and that all possible care may be taken for their timely supply, their wants being such as earnestly call for it: And that some speedy and effectual Course may be taken to provide for the Maimed Souldiers, and the Poor widows and Orphans, of such as have been slain in Your Service, that the Blessing of God may be upon You.

5. That such who have freely offered themselves in the severall Counties and Cities of C these Nations, to own and stand by You and your Cause in the late Insurrections, with the hazard of all which is dear unto them, may have Your Encouragement, and be Employed in Places of Trust and Command.

6. That it being a thing granted by all, that without due execution of Martial Discipline, the Peace, Union, and good Government of an Army cannot be preserved; The Discipline of the Army may be preserved inviolable, and in particular, That no Officer or Souldier of the Army may be cashier'd or Dismiss'd from their Places without a due proceeding at a Court-Martiall, or by his own Consent, except in cases of Reducement or D Disbanding.

7. That it being judged necessary by the Parliament, for the keeping of the Army under such a Conduct as may render the same Serviceable to the Commonwealth, to appoint a Committee of Nominations for the proposing of Officers to the Parliament for their Approbation; we humbly pray, That no Officers may be brought into the Army, but such as shall first come under the Consideration of the said Committee, and be by them presented.

8. The Office of the Commander in Chief of the Army being of so great Concernment to the Peace of this Commonwealth, and his Commission at present (as we conceive) expiring within a few months, we humbly pray, That the Consideration of that matter may come before you, and some such effectual course taken therein, as may prevent our fears, and the hazard of leaving the Army to Confusion.

9. And that you would retain a good Opinion of your Army, and against all discouragements whatsoever, proceed in the carrying on of that good work intrusted in your hands, for the Glory of God, and advantage of these Nations. In the prosecution whereof, through the help of our God, we shall be found (notwithstanding all endeavours to the contrary) faithfull to You and this Commonwealth.

The Insolency of these Proposals, gave our present Senators reason to suspect their Authority to be of no long continuance; but in regard many Officers of the Army dissented from the Representing and Proposing Party, they imagined the rest would not be very hasty to make a Rupture: Therefore they resolved to assert their Power at any hazard, in order whereunto, they had many sharp Debates about this Representation and Petition; but in the end they concluded with moderation, and directed their Speaker to call the Petitioners into the House, and acquaint them, That the Parliament had read their Representation and Petitions, and taking notice of the good Expressions therein of their Affections and Faithfulness to this Parliament and Commonwealth, had Commanded him to give them the Thanks of their House for them; and to let them know, That they had already taken into consideration the Relief of the Poor Widows, Orphans, and maimed Souldiers, to whom Pensions had been formerly allowed; and had also settled a way for satisfaction of the Arrears due to the Officers and Souldiers, and would endeavour to bring the same to speedy effect.

Desbrow gives an Account of this Answer to a Generall Cuncell of Officers who assembled that Afternoon on purpose. It was not unknown to them, That the House received their Address, and that in such a degree, that it was evident they intended to alter the Constitution of the Army. To

A Letter from a Committee of the Council of Officers, to Generall Monk, concerning the Army's Representation.

A To provide against this, they thought fit to strengthen their Party, by getting more Subscriptions to their Representation and Petition, and immediately they agreed upon the form of a Letter to be sent to Ireland, and another to Scotland, and to every Regiment in England: for the Signing and dispersing of which, they nominated from among themselves a select Number in the nature of a Committee. That to Generall Monk, was in these words:

Right Honourable,

WE do by Command from the Generall Council of the Officers of the Army now in London, transmit the inclosed to you, being a true Copy of the Representation and Petition which was this day by them humbly presented to the Parliament; and the Votes of the House passed thereupon: And are further to signify as their Desire, that the same may be Communicated to all the Commission Officers of that part of the Army under your Command, and the Subscriptions of all taken to the Representation and Petition, that are free to Sign the same; Which being so sign'd, It is desired you will be pleas'd to cause them to be close sealed up, and returned to Thomas Sandford Esquire, Secretary to his Excellency the Lord Fleetwood, who is to give an Account thereof. As we have thus fulfilled the General Councils Pleasure, we are well assured you will be pleas'd to comply with their Request; which is all at present from

Your humble Servants,

J. Lambert, Richard Creed, John Desbrow,
John Mason, William Packer.

The Generall had intimation of this Letter from Charges before it came to his hands, with a full Narrative of the Occurrences that passed upon the delivery of the Representation; which made him resolve to admit of no Subscriptions in Scotland. And when the Letter came to his hands, He returned in Answer to it; That he thought it unfit to have any Subscriptions made to that, to which now the Parliament had given an Answer, lest it should be understood to make a Party against them. And in pursuance of this Resolution, he sent Orders to all the Regiments under his Command, to forbid them to Subscribe.

The Substance of G. U. Monk's Answer.

The House a little before this Agitation, had begun to Court the Generall very much, as thinking it a matter of no small importance, to gain him wholly to them. And he having sent a Letter to them, (which they received Two dayes after the delivery of the Representation of the Army) to acquaint them with the peaceable condition of Scotland in obedience to their Government, where-in he moved something in favour of some of his Officers, and commended the temper of his Army: They returned him Answer the same dayes with this: Think of the House, and let him know, The high esteem they had of the Services which with so much Valour, Prudence, and Faithfulness he had performed; and that they had granted the desire of his Letters, with assurance to him and his Officers and Souldiers under his Command, of returns of Favour from the Parliament answerable to their merit.

He is Court'd by the Parliament Party.

And Complimented by Letters, with gratulatory expressions for his good Services.

Upon the Tenth of the said Moneth, they took the Proposals in the Armies Representation into Debate:

To the First, they Answer,

That the Officers of the Army have received, and shall from time to time receive marks of the Favour of the Parliament, and countenance answerable to their Merit and Faithfulness.

The House takes into Debate, and answers, one by one, the Army's Proposals.

To the Second they Answer,

That it is the Duty of all Persons, especially the Members of Parliament, to inform the House of any thing, which in their apprehension may concern the Publique Safety; And it is the undoubted Right of the Parliament to receive, and Debate those Informations, and to Resolve what they think fit thereupon.

To the Third they Declare,

That every Member of the Army, as Freemen of England, have right of Petitioning the Parliament: but withall, thinks fit to let them know, That the Petitioners ought to be very careful, both in the manner, and in the matter which they desire; That the way of promoting and presenting the same may be

" be peaceable; and the things Petitioned for, not tending to the disturbance of A
 " the Commonwealth, nor to the dishonour of the Parliament: And that it is " the Duty of Petitioners to submit their Desires to the Parliament, and to acquiesce in the Judgment thereof.

In Answer to the Fourth Propofall,

" They Order Two Months Pay to be forthwith paid to the Officers and " Souldiers of the Army in England, out of the Six Months Assesment of Five " and thirty thousand pounds a month now due; And that the Council of " State do give Order, that the same be paid accordingly; And that Two " Months Pay be also isstued to the Officers and Souldiers in Scotland and Ire" land. To that part of the Propofal, To provide for the Maimed Souldiers, and " the poor Widows and Orphans of such as had been slain in their Service,
 " They refer the former Votes made in their behalfs.

To the Fifth Propofal they Answer,

" That such Persons as have been Faithful and Active for the Parliament in " the late Insurrection, the Parliament will take care to give them all due encour" agement as occasion shall be offer'd.

This Resolute Procedure of the Members at Westminster, fill'd the Army with strange Rumours: And they in the mean time to provide against all Accidents, consulted, If any Breach should be made upon their Government, how to leave them that did it as destitute as might be of Means and Authority to maintain themselves in such actions. And since nothing could more weaken them in such Confusion than want of Money, They for a time defer'd their further consideration on the Proposals of the Representation, and made an Act against the raising of Money upon the People without Consent of Parliament; Wherein they Enact,

That all Orders, Ordinances and Acts, made by any Single Person and his Council, or by both or either of them, or otherwise, or by any Assembly or Convention pretending to have Authority of Parliament, from and after the Nineteenth day of April, 1653. and before the 7th of May, 1659. and which have not been or should not be Enacted, Allowed and Confirmed by this present Parliament, should be declared, deemed, taken and adjudged to be of no force or effect from and after the said Seventh day of May, 1659. And that no Person or Persons shall after the 11th day of October, 1659. Assess, Levy, Collect, Gather, or Receive any Customs, Impost, Excise, Assessment, Contribution, Tax, Tollage, or any Sum or Sums of Money, or other Imposition whatsoever, of this Commonwealth, without their Consent in Parliament, or as by Law might have been done before the Third of November, 1640. And that every person offending contrary to this Act, should be adjudged to be guilty of High Treason, and forfeit and suffer as in case of Treason.

That which chiefly provoked them to the hasty making of this Law, was a Letter which had bin communicated to them, under the hands of Lambert, Desborow, Berry, Kelsey, Ashfield, Cobbet, Parker, Barrow, and Creed, directed to Colonel Okey. It was much to the same Purport, with that sent to General Monk before-mentioned, and in the same Form: This Letter was by accident delivered to Okey; for there being many Letters signed, to be sent to the several Regiments, which were left to be dispos'd of by Fleetwood's Secretary, he, amongst others, directed one to Okey; who, as soon as he had it, shew'd it to Sir Arthur Haslerigg, and he to the House; who look't upon the Contents thereof, to be such as tended to the fomenting of the Army against them; but reliev'd the Consideration of it till the next Morning, which was the 12th of October.

That Night M. Nicholas Monk arrived (after not above four Dayes Journey) from Scotland, and had Orders from the General, to tell Charles, That he was resolv'd, if the Parliament would be resolute in asserting their own Authority against the Army, he would assist them in it; and if required thereunto, march into England in their Defence.

Charles, early the next Morning, communicated this to Walton, Haslerigg, and Seor, who were so much encouraged by it. That at the first sitting of the House, they moved, that the Doors might be shut, that none of their Members might go out; and then after a long and brisk Debate, they Ordered, That the Commissions of Lambert, Desborow, Berry, Kelsey, Ashfield, Cobbet, Parker, and Barrow, who subscribed the said Letter should be void.

They had it in Motion, to Declare at the same time, that the next immediate Officers to them should have their Commands conferred on them, but delay'd that till the next day, yet ordered the Names of those Officers to be brought to them: And before they parted, they made an Act, appointing

An Act of the Remnant against raising of Money without Consent of Parliament.

A Letter to Okey, the Chief of the Insurrey putting forth of this Act.

Mr. Monk arrives from Scotland, with private Orders from the General to Charles.

The Commissions of Lambert, Desborow, and others, voted void.

A appointing Commissioners for the Government of the Army; wherein they first repeal'd and made void the ACT, Constituting Charles Fleetwood Lieutenant-General and Commander in Chief of the Forces raised and to be raised by Authority of Parliament, within England and Scotland, and all Power and Authority thereby given; And that all the Armies for the future, should be governed by Commissioners, in the place and stead of a Lieutenant-General. These Commissioners were, Fleetwood, Monk, Ludlow, Haslerigg, Morley, Walton, and Overton, who were empowered, to execute all and singular the Powers and Authorities, incident or belonging to the Office of Lieutenant-General, from the 11th of October, 1659. to the 22nd of February, 1659, &c.

They likewise Ordered the Serjeant at Arms to carry the Orders for Discharge of the said Officer's Commissions, to the respective Persons whom it concerned: And because Lambert was the most considerable Person, and the next Officers to him were Men they knew, and in whom they confided, they immediately Ordered Camfield his Lieutenant-Colonel, to have the Command of his Regiment; and that Skepper the Major should be advanced to be Lieutenant-Colonel, and Captain Bradshaw to be Major of the Regiment. Three of these, lately Constituted Commissioners for the Government of the Army, met at Night, in the Speakers Chamber at Westminster, and Ordered Colonel Morley's and Colonel Moser's Regiments, as a Guard to the Parliament, who possessed themselves of the Palace-Yard, and the Great Hall: Lambert, on the other side, seeing what was like to become of him, if Matters were driven on at that Rate, as they were begun against him, thought best to play his Game, while it was in his Power to prevent; and to that end, drew some Regiments together, who march'd to Kings-Street, and possid themselves of all Avenues to the Parliament.

In the Morning, the Speaker came with his Coach towards the House; but at the Entry into the Palace-Yard, he was stop'd by Lieutenant-Colonel Duckfield; and after a little Expotulation, was forc'd to return. The Souldiers on both sides kept their Station till towards the Evening, in a Posture of Hostility, ready to have fir'd one against the other, only expecting when the Word would be given for the Onset; so that it was verily thought the Business would have come to a sharp Conflict between them: but they were better advis'd, inasmuch, that the Council of State meeting at White-Hall, and ordering all of them to draw off to their Quarters, both Parties agreed thereunto, and march'd away that Night: However, Lambert's Party obtain'd their Desire forasmuch as none of the Members were permitted that Day to assemble; and for the future,

Fleetwood took care always to keep good Guards at the Door of the Parliament-House, to prevent them from Meeting. The next Day divers of the chief Officers of the Army met at White-Hall, and chose Ten Persons as a Council, for carrying on the Affairs and Government of the Commonwealth, till further Order. These were Fleetwood, Lambert, Whitlock, Sir Henry Vane, Desbrow, Sir James Harrington, Major Salway, Berry, Sydenham, and Archibald Johnston a Scotch-man, commonly call'd the Laird of Warreston; And at Wallingford-House, the same day, the General Council of Officers, greed, That Fleetwood should be Commander in Chief over all the Armies; That Lambert should be the next chief Officer under him; and Desbrow Commissary General of the Horse; and that all the Officers, to be continu'd in the Army, should be nominated by Sir Henry Vane, Fleetwood, Lambert, Desbrow, Ludlow, and Berry; but in especial manner they took care for the preparing of Articles of Warre, for the good Government and Discipline of the Army, as that which would be most necessary for their Consistence. In this they were very industrious; and in all the times since the first modelling of their Armies, their Discipline was so exact, that the Carriage of their Souldiery was very tolerable to the People, and that made their Enormities, in reference to the Government, less obnoxious to Vulgar Censure: Some mentioned General Monk to be considered in their Distribution of Offices, but were not harkned to; and those that oppos'd it, assur'd the rest, That he had little power over the Officers of his Army; and if he disagreed to their Councils, he might be easily plac'd: They had not yet receiv'd his Resolution concerning the Subscriptions, about which they writ, to be made by his Officers to their Representation and Petition, and therefore were ignorant of his Dissent from their Actions: So that in Confidence of his Concurrency, they dispatch'd Colonel Cobbet to him, with a large Narrative of the Reasons of their Proceedings.

The Lord Mordaunt, and some others of the Kings Friends, lying at Callais, immediately upon the News of these Disorders in England, dispatch'd Mr. Nicholas Armorer to his Majesty, who was then at Fontarabie, industriously solliciting for Supplies of Men and Money, of which he had large Promises from the Spaniards; and for the defraying the Expences of his Journey, he receiv'd from Don Lewis de Haro, a Present of Twenty Thousand Crowns: His Majesty had once a Purpose to have gone directly to Madrid; but upon the Advice brought to him by Mr. Armorer, in hopes that something might fall out in England to his Advantage, he chose to return to Brussels. The Earl of St. Albans coming up to the Borders to the King, just upon the Dissolution of the Treaty, met his Majesty at Bayon, in his Return from Fontarabie; Cardinal Mazarini being before departed from St. John de Luz, not having receiv'd any Visit from his Majesty before his Departure.

The Earl of St. Albans conferr'd much with his Majesty, whilst he staid with him, which was not long, and then he went to Paris, whither the King follow'd him incognito, by easie Journeys; and after some stay there, went back from thence to Brussels.

The Council of Officers had frequent Meetings at White-Hall, and a Junctio of the wisest of them were in deep Consultation, how to make such a Frame of Government, as should be durable and

The Council of Officers consult about a Frame of Government. A certain number of Persons call'd to take upon them the Government, under the Title of a Committee of Safety.

and lasting, against all Attempts whatsoever. They found most of the Gentry in England to be a some way or other involved in the late Endeavours for the King, and were advising of a way to seize all their Estates, and divide them amongst their own Party, whereby the Riches of the Nation, the most powerful of all Interests, would be absolutely chang'd into the Hands of Persons irreconcilable to Monarchy. This was such Advice, as if it had succeeded, might have prov'd fatal, and laid a Foundation to Slavery, never to have been subverted.

The General Council, on the 26 of this Month, nominated 23 Persons, to be intrusted with the Management of Publick Affairs, whom they call'd a Committee of Safety; And the next Day they invited them to sit, and gave them Powers and Instructions; of which, the chief were,

1. To Execute all the Powers of the late Council of State, together with Authority to call all Delinquents to Account, that were in the late Insurrection, and to proceed to a bringing them to Justice, and to give Indemnity to all Persons that had acted for the Service of the Common-Wealth, since the Year, 1649.
2. To oppose and suppress all Rebellions and Insurrections.
3. To treat with Foreign States and Princes.
4. To raise the Militia in the several Counties.
5. To dispose of all Places of Trust that are void, and to remove such as are Scandalous.
6. To make Sale and Compositions for all Delinquents Estates.

Their Names.

The Names of these Governours were, Bulstrode Whitlock, lately made Keeper of their Great Seal, Fleetwood, Lambert, Desborow, Steel Chancellour of Ireland, Sir Henry Vane, Ludlow, Sydenham, Salway, Walter Strickland, Berry, Lawrence, Sir James Harrington, the Laird of Warfflen, Alderman Irons, Tichborn, Hewson, Clark, Bennett, Colonel Lilburn, Cornelius Holland, Henry Brandriff, and Robert Thompson.

They likewise publish'd a Declaration, in the Close whereof they Declare, That

The Substance of their Declaration.

They think themselves obliged, for preventing the manifold Evils and Inconveniences, which must necessarily fall upon the other Good People of the Nation, as well as themselves, by reason of the several Orders, Acts, pretended Acts, or other Declaration, or any of them, Enacted, made, or past on Monday the 10th of this instant October, and on Tuesday and Wednesday then next following, to declare them, and every of them null and void, to all intents and purposes: And likewise all Acts, Orders, and Proceedings thereupon had or done, in as full and ample manner, as if the said Orders, Acts, pretended Acts, or Declarations, and every of them, had never been: All which they publish and declare, that all persons concerned may take notice thereof, and no person whatsoever suffer any further prejudice thereby, hoping that all peaceable, well-minded, and unprejudiced persons will acquiesce in the Necessity and Justice thereof.

They further Declare to the World, that it is upon their Hearts, and they earnestly desire, and shall endeavour, that a due Liberty may be assured to all the Free-born People of these Nations, both as Men and Christians; That a full and through Reformation of the Law may be effected; as also, that a faithful, godly, and painful Gospel-Preaching-Ministry may be encouraged and provided for, by some certain way that may be less troublesome to them, and less vexatious to the People, than that of Tythes. And further, that they have no Aim or Ends to set up a Military or Arbitrary Government over the Common-Wealth: But have already provided, That the Civil and Executive part of Government, shall be lodg'd in a Committee of Safety; and they oblig'd in a short time, to prepare such a Form of Government, as may best suit and comport with a Free-State and Common-Wealth, without a Single Person, Kingship, or House of Peers; And that they shall, to the utmost of their Endeavours, labour to obtain those desirable things so often declar'd for; and to maintain and preserve the Peace of these Nations, in their several Stations and Places, and shall hope, That God for his own Glory, and the good of his own People, will give a blessed end of these Troubles, by a happy Settlement upon the Principles formerly declared for; and which have been, and still are, so earnestly breath'd after, by all those that truly fear his Name.

And then to Cajole the Godly Party (as they called them) they proceed to tell them;

They doubt not, but such being truly sensible of the many Temptations besetting them on every Hand, the great Difficulties they laboured under (and know not what further

Streights,

A Streights a Day may bring forth) will say on their Behalfs; Who are sufficient for these Things? And out of former Experiences being taught, That the Lord is a present help in time of Trouble, will cry aloud for them before the Throne of Grace; That the LORD himself may appear, and carry on his own work in their Hands: And if it shall please him by his Spirit, to stir up those that fear his Name to be instant on their Behalf, they shall not fear what Evil Man can do unto them.

These unreasonable Men, impatient of all Government, thought by these Insinuations, to silence all Gainers, and to make the People believe, they could frame any Government, and yet be oblig'd to submit to it. Their Confidence was great, and their frequent Invasion of several Constitutions so successful, that they thought they were not by any to be opposed, in the most extravagant of their Actings: yet in this Design of theirs, they had the better grounded hope, in regard Vane, Whitlock, and Salway, and some others of the most prudent of their Party, assisted in their Councils.

Whitlock, indeed, was much Censur'd for his Conjunction with them; but some wise men that mark'd his Demour, and the Moderation he us'd, did believe, that if he had not in a great measure restrain'd the Exorbitancy of their Intentions, they had in the short time of their Tyranny, done much mischief to many of the King's Friends.

That which put the greatest Check to their Career, and gave some Life to the fainting Hopes of all good Men, was the Arrival of Letters from General Monk in Scotland, to Fleetwood and Lambert, which came to them the 28 of October in the Evening. He complain'd therein, Of their Violation of Faith to the Parliament; and declar'd his Resolution, to endeavour to restore them to their Power, against all Opposition whatsoever.

Fleetwood, Lambert, and Desborow, immediately met at White-Hall in much Confusion; and about Twelve at Night they sent Major Haynes, to desire Clarges to come to them; who when he came, after some question of his knowledge of the Generals Proceedings (to which he made very wily Answers) They desired him to go into Scotland with Colonel Talbot (whose Regiment was then at Edinburgh) to prevail with Monk for a Treaty of Mediation, to prevent the effusion of Blood. They said, they chose Talbot to accompany him, because he was very grateful to the General.

Clarges was very glad of this Opportunity to get away, (for he fear'd to be much worse Treat-ed) and they were to pressing for his Departure, that they allowed him but three hours preparation for his Journey.

In the mean time, Monk in Scotland had by an Express from Clarges, which came to him the 17th of October, received exact Information of the Interruption of the Parliament; and at several times before, he had Notice of all the Proceedings introductory to it, which made him expect no less, and therefore gave him time to prepare for what hapned.

He had in Scotland at this time Ten Regiments of Foot compleat, each consisting of a Thousand Soldiers, besides Officers; except four Companies which had been drawn into England a little before upon the Alarm of Sir George Booth's Rising; his Numbers of Horse were but small, having had two Regiments of them likewise removed upon the same occasion: so that there remained with him but two Regiments of Horse, viz. his own, and Colonel Philip Twissleton's, and one Regiment of Dragoons, Commanded by Major General Morgan: The Foot were dispersed at great distances, Eight Companies of his own Regiment lay at Edinburgh, and two of them at Dalkeith, where his Residence usually was: All Colonel Talbot's Regiment was quarter'd in Edinburgh, Nine Companies of Colonel Wilks's Regiment were in the Citadel at Leith, and one of them in the Castle at Edinburgh; Nine Companies of Colonel Read's Regiment were at Sterling, and the Tents in England; Eight Companies of Colonel Burton's Regiment at Dundee, and two of them in England; Colonel Daniel's Regiment lay at St. Johnstone's, Colonel Savies Regiment at Aire, Colonel Cobbet's at Glasgow; Nine Companies of Colonel Fairfax's Regiment at Aberdeen, and the other in England; and part of Colonel Smith's Regiment at Inverness; and the rest of the Garrisons in the Highlands: The Horse and Dragoons lay in several place near the Foot-Quarters; but at such distances, as might not incommode the Country.

The late Commissioners of Nomination, whilst they sat at White-Hall, had much chang'd the Officers in all the Regiments, both of Horse and Foot, which rais'd great Discontents amongst them: They had given Colonel Daniel's Regiment to Perfon, his Lieutenant-Colonel, an Anabaptist; They had also displaced Habbeshorn, who was Major to Colonel Talbot's Regiment; Hughes, who was Major to Wilks, they had reduc'd to be but Captain, and prefer'd one Knowles an Anabaptist to his Command; Johnson, the Eldest Captain in his own Regiment of Horse, they put out, and many more (too long to mention) in all the Regiments; few or none of those New Officers chosen at White-Hall, to supply the Places of those removed, were yet come into Scotland: So that General Monk, taking this Opportunity, to retain all the displaced Officers in their respective Commands, made them who had been thus disoblig'd before, thereby intirely depend on him.

Having resolv'd to stand upon his Guard, and Declare against the Army in England, the first thing he did, was to Consult, which way best to secure these Regiments, and the several Garrisons, with

The first Minute that he had Notice of the Disorders at Westminster, which was on the before-mentioned 17th Day of October, he sent Captain Jeremy Smith of his own Regiment of Horse, to Edinburgh and Leith, to signify his Pleasure to Major Hubbleborn, Major Hughes, and Captain Johnson, to have them come to him to Dalkeith: The first was Major to Talbot's Regiment of Foot; the other, to that of Wilkes, Quarter'd at Leith; and Johnson Commanded a Troop in his own Regiment of Horse.

There came immediately upon Summons to the General, and there they met Captain Morgan of his own Regiment of Foot, and Miller of Wilkes his Regiment, who had the Guards of Dulwich House: The Lieutenant-Colonel, and Major of the Generals Regiment, were both Anabaptists, and at that time absent; Lieutenant-Colonel Cloberry of Read's Regiment, was by chance there, and was advised with. The General communicated his Intelligence to them, and his Resolution to march into England with a part of his Army, to re-establish the Parliament; To which they all freely consented: Hubbardhorn gave him perfect Assurance of all Talbot's Regiment, of which he had now the Command; because the Colonel, and Pommel the Lieutenant-Colonel, were both in England: And indeed much must be attributed to the Courage and Diligence of that Gentleman, whose Regiment was by him entirely, both Officers and Souldiers, made at the General's Devotion; which being then quarter'd at Edinburgh, gave a great Reputation to he whole Undertaking: For although some in all the Regiments, and many in most, were ready upon the Confidence they had in the General's Courage and Conduct, and were well inclined towards him; yet they were all apt to follow in any Design (as most naturally are) than to begin the Action: Captain Johnson had been by the Noninators at London removed from his Troop, but was now by the General restored to it; and as he was eldest Captain of the Regiment, by the absence of Major Knight, he had the Command under the General, of all his Regiment of Horse, and was well-belov'd by them: Major Hughes gave him hopes of making all Colonel Wilkes his Regiment at his Service: Hubbardhorn (whom he made Lieutenant-Colonel of the Regiment) was Order'd to draw it early the next Morning into the High-Street at Edinburgh, and to let all the Musketeers have Matches lighted, with Powder and Bullet; And Johnson was Commanded to be ready in Edinburgh at the same time, with his own Troop; and that of one Captain Symmel's, an honest stout Officer: Hughes was appointed, in the absence of his Colonel, and Lieutenant-Colonel, who were sent for the next Morning to confer with the General, to secure the Citadel at Leith: He had upon some kind of Expectation of Change, kept Captain Witter (of the Regiment lying at St. Johnstons) and Captain Robson (of the Regiment at Aire) both at Edinburgh, and had sent for them to him; and upon Conference with them, they both undertook, One to secure the Citadel at St. Johnstons, and the other at Aire; which were very difficult Service to perform, in regard that most of the Officers in those Regiments, were very ill-dispos'd towards the General: Little more was done that Night, but the sending an Express to Major Knight, who was then in York-shire at his own House, to hasten him to his Command.

The next day after dinner the General marched to Edenborough, with onely Captain Smiths. Troop of Horse, having before dispatched away Witter and Robson. Morgan had been sent before to Edenburgh, to draw up his Regiment, but had Orders to give them neither March, Powder nor Ball: As soon as he came into the High-street, and found the Regiments in that order he expected, He retired a little into his Quarters, to model his own Regiment, and sent for Morgan to him, whom he immediately made Lieutenant Colonel, Captain Nicholas he promoted to be Major, and at the same instant displaced all whom he knew to be disaffected to him, and such of them as were dangerous, he imprisoned: which done, he march't with both the Regiments to the Gray Friers Church, where he call'd together the Officers, and told them, That the Army in England had broken up the Parliament out of a restless unconventurable disposition of being pleas'd with nothing that tended to the welfare and happiness of the People, that though they had lately taken shame to themselves, (in their publick Declaration) for their former Apostacies, yet now finding the Parliament unsat to honour them in all their Extravagancies, they were weary of them: He said he was resolved to make the Military Power subservient to the Civil, and that since they had their Protection and Entertainment from the Parliament, it was their Duty to serve and obey them against all opposition; which should be his practice, and he expected their Concurrence and Assistance to joyn with him. But if any were dissatisfied, and would declare it to him, they should have free liberty, without Reflection to leave the Service, and have passages to go home.

Upon this, Colonel Wilkes and his Lieutenant Colonel, with all that were present, unanimously declar'd to live and die with him ; Captain Johnson was then dispatch'd to Barnick, to secure that Garrison, which was then under the Command of Lieutenant Colonel Mayers ; and he did it very effectually, and it was a Service of great advantage to Monck's Designs ; Captain Hart, and Captain Dennis, two well approved Officers of Colonel Cobbets Regiment, being both at Estim brenels,

A burgh when these transactions were, and having received private Orders to model that Regiment then quartered at Glasgow, and to march with it to Edinburgh, came thither before any knowledge of the alterations at the Head-Quarters, and privately consulted with such of the Regiment as they were confident of before they publicly discovered their Orders: Lieutenant Colonel Young, who was there in chief in the absence of the Colonel and Major, did as much as he could to oppose it; but he being presently secured, Hatt and Dennis perform'd their instructions, and immediately march'd the Regiment to the General.

Captain Witter, as soon as he came to St. Johnstown, drew up two Companies, whom he most Cap. Witter confided in, upon the Sands before the Citadell, and propoied to them what he had in charge takes possi- from the Generall; whereupon they all shoud in consent to it, at the noyfe whereof, the Sould- fiers coming in confusion out of the Citadell, he march'd with the foresaid Companies into it, and the Gen- rals possession thereof; He made Lieutenant Colonel Keine, and Major Kelke Prisoners; the Cit- adell of St. Johnstown. The first whereof, was afterwards upon his consent to joyn with the Generall, releasd from his Impri- sonment, but Kelke was still detained. Of this Regiment at St. Johnstown, Witter, for his hand- some performance of this undertaking, is by the Generall advanc'd to be Major. And is made Major of the Regiment.

Robson at Ayr was more deliberate in the execution of his Orders, he dealt to with the Officers, that most of them, except the Colonel and Lieutenant Colonel, agreed to comply with the General all. The Lieutenant Colonel privately got away to Carlisle and secured that Garrison for the Army in England; The Colonel temporized a while, but finding his Arts successful, and thereupon flying away into England, the General gave the Command of the Regiment to Robson, for his good Service, and sent into England for Colonel Daniel, who had been a little before displaced, and Pierfon his Lieutenant Colonel advanced to the Command of that Regiment, and it is made Command of Colonel thereof.

The settlement of these two Regiments gave much encouragement to the Generall, in reference to the carrying on of his Design; and the rather, in regard he himself had lookt upon it as none of the easiest works to compass.

He made no alteration at first in those Companies which belong'd to Colonel Overson at Dundee, because he had hopes to gain him to declare for him with the Garrison at Hull, then under his Command, and in regard they were on that side of the River Tay, they could not have done much if they had opposed. He sent to Colonel Fairfax who quarrelled with his Principles

D at Aberdeen, to ha'th with it to Edinburgh, and Lieutenant Colonel Clobergh was sent to Read, his Colonel at Sterling, to appoint him to march to the Generall with all his men, except two Companies, which were to be left for the safety of the Town and Castle. And at the same time, he sent a Commission to Inverness to Colonel Man, to be Colonel of that Regiment, in the place of Smith, Smith's Regi(who adhered to the Army in England) and appointed him to send three of his best Companies to Edinburgh. He dispa'ch'd also some trusty Officers to the Horse-Troops, and then went himself ment at Inver- to Leith, to settle the Citadel and Regiment in obedience to him; upon his first coming, he dis- ness, given to plac'd Kneller, and confin'd him, and restored Hughes to be again Major to the Regiment, and the Generall Colonel Man.
 likewise some other Anabaptist Officers were put out, and others plac'd in their Rooms; Captain Cliffow, who with a Company of this Regiment from Leith, had the Command of Edinburgh the Citadel, E Castle, upon promise of faithfulness and service to the Generall, was by him continued in his and Regiment Command with trust and Confidence. And thus these three Regiments of Foot at Leith and Edinburgh, were in one Afternoon pretty well settl'd, till more time could be allow'd to refine them.

Upon the 21, he march'd some Companies of Horse and Foot to Lindisgow, intending to go thence to Glasgow, to settle Cobbins Regiment, of which he was in some doubt; but he there receiv'd Intelligence of what was done by Hutt and Dimmis; and therefore went no further.

Of this Regiment at St. Johnstons, Winter, for his handsome performance of this undertaking, is by the General advanced to be Major.

Robson at Ayr was more deliberate in the execution of his Orders, he dealt so with the Officers, that most of them, except the Colonel and Lieutenant Colonel, agreed to comply with the General. The Lieutenant Colonel privately got away to Carlisle, and secur'd that Garrison for the Army in England; The Colonel temporiz'd a while, but finding his Arts successful, and thereupon flying away into England, the General gave the Command of the Regiment to Robson, for his good Service, and sent into England for Colonel Daniel, who had been a little before displac'd, Colonel of the (and Pierfon his Lieutenant Colonel advanced to the Command of that Regiment) to take again his Regiment, Command of Colonel thereof.

He there also had notice of the submission of the Cittadell at Ayr, and that Barnwick was render'd to him, where Colonel Cobbert was stay'd and detained in Prison; as he was coming into Scotland with his Regiment, and it was seasonably done; for if he had been permitted to passe, the opinion which was had of him by the Souldiers, might have much hinder'd the Generals Proceedings. He was brought with a Guard to Edinburgh Castle, and kept there, the General being much incens'd against him, upon private advice that he had Instructions to have seiz'd him, if he had not agreed to the Armies Actions in England. At Linlithgow at a Council of Officers, it was advis'd that some way should be us'd to draw off the Independent Churches in England, from favouring the English Army, which would have much weaken'd that party; if it had succeeded, for most of the inferior Officers were of that persuasion; for the effecting of this, a Declaration was fram'd, agreed to, and published and dispers'd all over England. And at the same time, another Declaration was also made to satisfy the Kingdom in general, with the reason of his taking Arms; alleging that he did it for the vindication of the Rights and Liberties of the People, and the freedom of Parliaments.

Two Expostulatory Letters were also writ, the one to Fleetwood, and the other to Lambert, blaming the violence of their Proceedings against the Parliament, and another to the Speakers, to be inform'd of his Condition wherein the House then was, declaring therein, that whereas there ought to be a right understanding between the Parliament and the Army, he would be ready, in case the Army persister'd to disobey their Orders, to assist them with the Forces under his Command, according to his Duty.

He discovers to Clarges some glimpsing of his intentions.

The present condition of Monck for money and ammunition.

Lambert's Army in great want of money.

By this time, Major Knight was returned out of England; for hearing of the disorders at London, and that some jealousies had been entertained of him, upon an Information that he had been some Months before engaged with the Lord Castleton in St George Booths Rising, he thought best for his own security, to make all possible haste down to his Command, his Arrival fell out to be three days after the General had first Declared, Morgan's Regiment of Dragoons, was made a Regiment of Horse, and Major Farmer was sent with a Troop to secure Carlisle, who when he came thither, did not march into it with Confidence, as Johnson did into Barwick, but sent in to treat with the Governor, and was so long doing it, till Ellon that Commanded the Town had fix'd the Soldiers to a Resolution of keeping him out; moreover, Monck considering that his Army could not be got together in six weeks time, to march into England, he therefore to amule the faction there, sent Major Knight with four Troops of choice Horse, and six Companies of Foot, to surprize Newcastle. The Horse-Troops were Commanded by Knight, Johnson, Wilmot, and Simmell, and the Foot by Miller, Mansfield, Collins, Winter, Seymour, and Belcham, all gallant and well-resolv'd men. But being come as far as Morpeth, he had advice, that some Forces were got into Newcastle before him, which being intimated also to the General, he presently counter-manded him and his party to Amwick, where he stayed for some time; This not taking Newcastle was no discouragement to the General or his Army; for upon more deliberate Consideration, he thought the misfortune rather fortunate, than prejudicial to him, since if he had taken it, it would in all probability, have been immediately beleagued by Lambert. And then he must have been obliged to attempt the relief of it, and fought before he could have been well enough prepared for it, and thereby have hazarded his whole design.

The General at the same time that he sent the before-mentioned Letters to London, did likewise send a Messenger with Letters to Lieutenant General Ludlow, who Commanded the Army in Ireland, to move him to join with him, or at least to represent to him to fair an accomplice of his Actions, as might induce him not to be his hinderance in any of his undertakings.

Colonel Lilburn, who lay at York with some Forces, upon the first Rumour of Monck's Declaration, drew what Forces together he could, and without staying to be well informed of the Reasons of Fleetwood and Lambert's breaking up the Parliament, He drew all the Officers in those parts to enter into an Association against Monck, and to join with the Army at London, in whatsoever they design'd.

He also writ to Mr. Clarke, the General's Secretary, who was an active useful Instrument in his affairs, to seduce him from his Service; the truth is, the greatest part of Clarke's Estate was in England, and he was a man of so civil and ingenious a Conversation, that he might have been the better excus'd in a Neutrality to both parties, and his Interest did direct him to it. But he was resolv'd to hazard all his Fortunes in the General's Bottom, and would not by threats or cunning, which were both used by Lilburn to him, be prevail'd with to quit his party. For which his fidelity and constancy, at this time, he was ever after so much esteem'd by the General, that he trusted him with his most secret transactions.

Major General Morgan had lain long sick of the Gout at York, and began about this time, to recover his health. The Letter which Monck sent to him was intercepted by Lilburn, which Morgan a little resent'd, but thought it advisable so far to conceal his passion (till he might have a convenient opportunity to get into Scotland) as to seem to Lilburn rather to dislike than approve of the General's proceedings.

Colonel Talbot and Clarges, came not to Edinburgh, till the second of November, they were both very well received by Monck; but especially Clarges, being his Brother in Law, with whom he had that night much Conference in private. The General wonder'd, that Fleetwood and Lambert would send him, and thought it a good Omen to his success, that he had him to assist his design. Clarges frankly ask'd him what was the true end he aimed at in this Enterprize, telling him, that it was impossible for him to be ever trusted after this rupture, if he patch'd up a Peace with the English Army, and withal acquainting him that he observ'd a great Consternation in the Officers and Soldiers, as he pass'd, and that he believ'd many of them would fall off to him.

The General, as he is the most reliev'd man living, was in some trouble to be press'd to discover his intentions, and at that time open'd himself no further than to let him know he was resolv'd to endeavour to free his Native Country from the slavery it was under, and to effect it, he thought one of the best expedients would be to restore the Parliament; but in their Admission to sit (if it were by his Arms) he would make no difference betwixt them; but let in as well the secluded Members as others. Having said this, he conjur'd Clarges to secrecy, being very sensible, that the jealousy had on him by the Army, was so great (it having been often cast in his dish by some of his ill-willers, that the King was in the bottom of his Designs) that all he could contrive, would be little enough to beget a Confidence, even in his own Party to engage with him.

As to the present Condition of his Affairs, he acquainted him that he had about Seventy thousand pounds in money, part whereof was already in his Treasury, and the rest would in a short time be paid into it. And that all his Magazines were very well stor'd with Ammunition, Arms, and all other necessities, and that he had in part modell'd his Army fit for his purposes, and should in a while perfect it. Clarges let him know, that the wants in Fleetwood and Lambert's Army were very great, and that upon Lambert's Expedition, they were not able to advance one month's Pay for his Army, which would make them by free Quarter, be very burthenome and distastfull to the Country. So that if by a Treaty, or any other means he could protract time, his business might be

Their Instructions.

As he done without hazard. The General replied, That he thought the overture of a Treaty from Fleetwood and Lambert, might be improved to his great advantage, for he could not in a month's time, draw his men together. And that his sending Knight with a Party to Lodge at Amwick, was to make them think him in greater readiness than he was; the more thereby to distract their Leavies. The General then Resolv'd upon a Treaty, and the next morning summon'd his chief Officers together, to nominate Commissioners, and to resolve upon Instructions for them. He chose to advise with his Officers in all these matters, to free them from suspicion. Colonel Talbot was very glad his Journey was so successful to obtain a Treaty so easily. The General and his Officers met, and at the first Proposition, they consented to the motion for a Treaty, and when he put them to name fit persons to be Commissioners, they referred it to him. He then appointed

Major Knight, and Lieutenant Colonel Claberry to be two, and put it to them to name a third, and they propos'd Colonel Wilks, who was reputed to be a good Religious man, and acceptable to Fleetwood, and the Officers in England. They then came to consider of Instructions, and were for in debate, that the Question was not without much content carried for allowing them a fortnights time for the treaty. The General was perplex'd in his mind at this, for he would not have them limited to time, because that was the only thing he wanted, yet he discover'd no displeasure; however, in the rest of the Instructions, he so invent'd matter to confound their debates, That they had no power given them to conclude any thing, for whereas those they treated with, were so ill Statesmen, that what they insist'd on appear'd to be rather a foundation for a new System of Government, then restoring the Parliament to their Exercise of Power, The Commissioners were to insist on the restoring the Parliament: But if the Members should refuse to sit, then to debate of some other form of Government. They were likewise to provide for an Act of Indemnity for all Acts done since the first of October, and to take care that the Arrears of such part of the English Assisment as was appropriated to the Pay of the Army in Scotland, should be forthwith paid; And that a godly, learned, and faithfull Ministry, with competent maintenance, and other encouragements, should be continued in the three Nations; the like regard being had to Schools and Universities, with many other matters sufficiently remote from the present affaire; Moreover, it was particularly urg'd, That they should provide, that the Acts of the Army in England, should not be deemed the Acts of a General Council of the Army, without the Concurrence of the Officers of the Armies of Scotland and Ireland.

These Commissioners were hasten'd away, and Lambert was so far advanced with his Army, as to meet them at York, where he told them he had full power from Fleetwood, the Officers of the Army, and the Committee of Safety, to treat, and conclude with them of all differences. They seem'd not averse to it, but when they began to enter upon the matter, and propos'd the restitution of the Parliament, he told them, Fleetwood and the Officers at London had agreed with him and his Officers not to conclude of any thing concerning that matter, without the common consent of all, and so they went forwards towards London. Nevertheless, as a thing previous to the Treaty, it was by both parties accorded, That the Forces of neither should advance from their Quarters, and that there should be a free uninterrupted intercourse of Letters during the Treaty.

The Army of Horse and Foot with Lambert did amount to near Twelve thousand, and Monck had not above half the Number; nevertheless he had this advantage, namely, that he paid all his Men, and the other did not. The way he had for providing Money, was very accidental: The late Parliament (so call'd) about the latter end of June (as is before express'd) had made a short Act to authorize the Payment of a Years Tax upon England, Scotland, and Ireland, appointed to be raised by one of Cromwell's Parliaments; And they in that Act directed One M<sup>o</sup>ney of the money to be paid the First of August, and the other the Tenth of October following. The Proportion for Scotland to pay of this Tax, was Six Thousand pounds a Month; and in regard the Country was poor, and burden'd with many other Payments, the General writ to all the Commissioners of Shires, and indulg'd them so far as to grant them forbearance of payment till the Tenth of October for the first moiety, and Two months after for the rest, which they readily undertook to do, and perform'd it for the most part: And this he had represented so effectually by Clarges his Agent to the Parliament, that he got Twenty thousand pounds in Money to be sent into Scotland towards the Pay of his Army, till that money could be Collected. And that was the bulk of all the Money he had in this Undertaking; but it was increased by Excise and Customs, and other Duties, for after he declar'd, he seiz'd on all. And of all this we make the more particular mention in this place, because some, ignorant of these Transactions, have published, That the General had an Assisment raised for him at a Convention of the Nobility of Scotland; which was first invented by the Scithious in England to his prejudice, and afterwards because uncontra-dicted, believ'd for a Truth.

Lambert was inform'd, That Major General Morgan (who about this time began to be recovered of his Gout) was dissenting to General Monck's Proceedings, and that he would be willing to go to him to dissuade him from the Course he took; Lambert encourag'd the Motion as if it had been made him by Morgan himself; and Morgan, it being taken for granted that he had undertaken the business, at a dayes Warning began his Journey from York towards Edinburgh, he had with him one Troutbeck a Chirurgeon, (upon pretence of taking care of his health) a very subtle Intelligent Person, Excellent in his Profession, and withal of great discretion, and much belov'd by the Soldiers of both Armies, and of considerable Interest amongst them. These got safe to Edinburgh about the 7th or 8th of November; And the coming of Morgan was a good Accellion to Monk's Party, and a great encouragement to all the Officers and Souldiers: For he was esteem'd by them to be, next the Generall, a Person of the best Conduct of any then in Arms in the Three Nations, having been near Forty years a Souldier, and present in the greatest Battells and Sieges of Christendome for a great part of that time; and particularly in Flanders, where he Commanded a Brigade of Foot, he acquitted himself to the Astonishment of his Enemies, and the admiration of Marshall Thurene, and all the French Commanders in that Service with him. At his first coming to the Generall, he ask'd him aloud, merrily, If he would lay down his Arms, and be friends with Fleetwood and Lambert? To which he was answered by him, If they would restore the Parliament, he had little more to say; and if he pleas'd, he might let them know as much. Morgan Replied, I promised to ask you the Question, but not to return to them that sent me, if you denied it: I am very glad I am here with you to assist you, and follow your Fortunes in all your undertakings; You know I am no States-man; I am sure you are a Lover of your Country, and therefore I will joyn with you in all your Actions, and submit to your Prudence and judgment in the Conduct of them.

This generous Friendship was kindly received by Monk, and it was the more valuable, in that it was done at a time when the Army in England was at its greatest height; and that in Scotland very inconsiderable in respect of the other, and not yet well settled; for a day or two before, one of the Troops of Morgan's own Regiment ran over Tweed to Lambert.

In the Evening, Morgan was private with the Generall, and delivered him a Letter which he brought from Mr. Bolea a Minister of York, a very eminent Man of those Parts, and of great Credit with my Lord Fairfax, and many others of good Note in that County. Clarges being yet at Edinburgh, and Consulted with in the business. The Letter import'd, That the Lord Fairfax and many others of good Interest in Yorkshire were willing to joyn with the Generall, but that they disapproved of his Declaration which was restrained to the restoring of that Part of the Parliament only which sat after the Seclusion of the rest; and was filled with many Protestations for the asserting of no other than a Commonwealth Government. To this the Generall answered, That Clarges could witness his Intentions in those Particulars, That what was P. in his Name, was not at that Conjunction to be regarded as the Result of his own Reason, because his Writings were drawn by other hands; and till his Affairs had a firmer Consistency, and he more Power in his hands, it was unreasonable for him to contradict what was done, since all that was writ, could scarce prevail with the Army to believe he had not a Design to set up the King in his Government. The Conclusion of this, was to send Clarges to Fairfax, Roffiter, and several others, to engage them; it being thought expedient, at the same time, to employ all possible care to amule the Parliament and Army, till the Generall could get a Power in his hands to Justifie other Councils. Clarges was dispatch'd to Bowles, with a Letter of Credit to him, to cause a belief in him of what he should acquaint him with, on the part of the Generall; and another Letter to the same purpose to my Lord Fairfax, from whom he was to have an Address to Roffiter in Lincolnshire.

Talbot knew nothing of these Travels, but carried himself with much moderation all the time of his stay, and with so much profession of respect to the Generall, That he assur'd him, If he would go to London and be a Neuter, he would preserve his Regiment for him: Which he promised to do, but was afterwards by the importunity of Lambert, prevail'd upon to act contrary to that Engagement, and (some think) to his own Inclinations; for he was esteem'd by all that knew him, to be a Person not averse to a better and more Just Government than he at that time liv'd under, and was obliging to all the Gentry where he lived, that needed his Assistance and help.

Fleetwood could not conceal his fears; for the same Week that Talbot and Clarges were sent to endeavour a Reconciliation, before he had any return from them, Captain Dew, one of the Treasurers, and not long after, Mr. Caryll the Minister, with Col. Goff and Whaley, were sent to the Generall on the same Errand: Likewise Mr. Hammon and Mr. Barker were deputed in the name of the Independent Congregations in and about London, to mediate a Peace betwixt the two Armies.

Mean while, Clarges and Talbot, of whose Negotiations we shall hear more hereafter, took their Leaves of the Generall to return home. The pretence of Dean's coming into Scotland, before Caryll and Whaley, was to look after his Charge; for he was one of the Treasurers at War; but he privately dispersed Tickets as he travelled, to seduce Monk's Souldiers from him, bringing him withal a Letter from Fleetwood, which contain'd an Offer of what Command in the Army he should desire, upon the least private intimation of his inclining to take part with him: This made the Generall to believe there were some Jealousies betwixt Lambert and him; which he might have improv'd to the breaking of one of them; but he chose the more Generous way, and refused the Offer, Letting him know, He fought not himself, but the good of the Nation; and when that was obtained, he would rather lay the Command, he had, down, than seek to enlarge it.

Lieutenant Colonel Barret came at the same time from Ireland with a Letter from Sir Hardres Waller, John Jones, and the ruling people of that Country (for Ludlow was then in England), declaring their Refusal to joyn with the Generall; Letting him know by their said Letter bearing date the 4th of November,

A That at a Generall Meeting of the Officers of the Irish Army, they unanimously resolv'd not to approve of the Resolution he had taken, which tended (as they alledg'd) to the Engaging of part of the Armies of these Nations against their Brethren, or the dividing of them in Interest or Affection; being well Assured, that such a Practice would be found in the Issue to be nothing else but the opening of a door for the Common Enemy to come in, (whatever Umbrage should be put upon it) and destroy those very Persons and Authority on whose behalf their affections inclin'd them to undergo very great difficulties. Adding, That they held it a Duty incumbent on them towards him (as their honourable Friend of whom they had a very high esteem) in the behalf of all the people of the Lord in these three Nations, to bear their Witness against any such Resolution or Practice, and to improve their utmost endeavours to prevent the same.

The Generall was not at all discouraged at this return to his Civill Letters and Declaration sent thither, having at the same time received advice from Cornet Monk, by any other hand, That Sir Charles Coor, Sir Theophilus Jones, and a very considerable part of the Army, were resolv'd to Assist him; That Sir Hardres Waller himself might in time be drawn to joyn with them, and that he doubted not in a short while to receive good effects of their endeavours.

But in the mean time, upon notice that Dean and Barret were Active to withdraw the affections of the Souldiers from their Duties, they were thereupon sent away from Scotland with a severe Rebuke; The Generall being unwilling to punish them by Imprisonment or any severer course, because they came to him on publique Business.

These Men did much mischief amongst the Souldiers, who were many of them by their inveiglements seduc'd; Two Troops of Twisleton's Regiment of Horse, Commanded by Ashley and Dean, refused to joyn with the Generall, and were Thirty three of them dismounted, disarmed and cashier'd, and Foot Souldiers put on their Horses: But Forty of Dean's Troop with their Colours ran into England; And Two Companies of Foot of the Regiment which came from St. John's, being Quartered at Dunbarr, had like to have been betrayed to New-Castle by one Captain Guillim, who had been lately of that Regiment and was discharg'd; This Guillim procuring leave to go into England, came to Dunbarr, where he made the Souldiers believe that he D was by the Generall restored to his Command, and had order to secure Captain Thompson who then Commanded them, and to carry them in Boats to Berwick; Some of the Sergeants so far gave Credit to him, that they plac'd a Guard upon Thompson, whilst he in the mean time was hiring Boats to carry them, and was so earnest in it, that he would have taken any, though never so leaky, for their Conveyance: This put the Men into some Jealousie, inasmuch, that they desired to see his Orders; whereupon he leav'd upon his Horse, and ran away.

At Sterling, a Troop of Col. Sanders his Regiment was in the like Disorder, and about 30 of the men dismounted, and others put in their places. This oblig'd the General to be more circumspect in the reforming his Regiments; so that he discharged all the Officers, whom he any way suspected, and sent them into England. In Colonel Fairfax's Regiment eighteen Officers were E discharg'd; and in most of the rest, some were put out, in all, to the number of seven score Persons: These Regiments wherein least alteration was made, were Talbot's, and Reads; the first, through the Diligence of Hubblehorn, who a while after deserting, upon Talbot's joyning with Lambert, had the Regiment conferr'd upon him; and the latter, by the Care and good Example of the Colonel, who was a Person that always lov'd and esteem'd the General.

Lambert was much troubled, when he heard that Morgan had deserted him, and when Talbot and Clarges came to York, he complain'd of it as a kind of Breach of Faith, but was quickly by Clarges better satisfied: for he assur'd him, he heard him move General Monk to a Peace with him; but being Major-General of that Army, he could not refuse to do his Duty, in staying there where his charge was, since the Difference between the two Armies was not yet come to that Degree, to make it beyond hopes of Reconciliation; and that he might rather further the same by his Presence, than Absence.

Clarges, as hath been already mention'd, had receiv'd a Letter to the Lord Fairfax, from the General, and some Instructions to Roffiter, and several others, about which he was secretly to confer with Bowles the Minister at York, to whom also he brought a Letter of Credit, for what he should propose to him; Bowles, with whom he had much Discourse, desir'd to be fully informed of the Generals Intentions, and was by Clarges so well satisfied in them, that he undertook to negotiate with the Lord Fairfax, Colonel Bethel, and several others in Monk's behalf; and for Evidence of it, he advis'd him to stay privately in York, till he went to confer with the Lord Fairfax at his House at Nym Appleton, six miles from thence, (that he might know what Advice to send into Scotland) which he accordingly did. And at his Return, acquainted him, That Fairfax would rise by the midst of January, and he might be confident Bethel and Smithson would joyn with him, who were men of good Interest, and well-belov'd of the Souldiery in Lambert's Army: On the other side, Bowles press'd to know what Expectations the General had from other places, and was by Clarges inform'd, that Colonel Wetnam at Portsmouth was a great Friend to the General, and he doubted not, but he would take the first Opportunity he could, to declare with that Garrison for him; which he lik'd very well, for Wetnam was a moderate man: He told him likewise, likewise, that Colonel Hacker with his Regiment would raise some men in Nottinghamshire and Leicestershire, and Colonel Hutchinson, and Sir Arthur Haslerig, would join with them; and that Okey was labouring to make Disturbances in London amongst the Regiment there. Bowles at first was not well pleased, that he should make use of these Aids: But when he was acquainted by Charles with the Reasons which induced him to it, he was satisfied.

The first thing the General design'd, was to break Lambert's Forces, to make himself Master of all the Armies; and to effect this, it was requisite to refuse no help, since the Major Part of the whole would be such as he could make use of to model the rest, to any purpose he could employ them in. Then they found out a secret Messenger to send with intimation of this Conference to Monck; And Charles went towards Lincolnshire to pursue his Negotiations: but about December he had so grievous a fall from his Horse, as he was riding Post, that his Life was despaired of; but after a little stay there, he was brought to a Village betwixt Tuxford and Newark, where he was forc'd to stay ten days ere he was able to travel; nevertheless, in the mean time he sent Expresses several ways, and by the means of one Briffon, a Confident of Colonel Riffers, he had opportunity to send to him, and had his Answer; which was, That he would join with Fairfax, and do what he should direct. When he came to Leicestershire, he heard nothing of Hastlerig, but that he had, in despair of doing any thing, retir'd to Woodstock; and the Reason he gave for it, was, That if he should raise Forces in his County, it might give occasion to the Kings Party to join, and thereby hazard the whole Cause; and that therefore it would be better to close with the Army in all their Exorbitances, than venture with so much danger to oppose it.

Charles was somewhat troubled at this Discouragement, but omitted not to proceed in his Endeavours; and thereupon sent to many of the Council of State, who were retired, to draw them privately to London, to assist with their Councils, in promoting the Restoration of the Parliament; which he did upon Obligation amongst the Souliers of Lambert's Army, that they favoured much the Declaration of Monck, for restoring that Authority, and were only diverted from joining with him against Lambert, upon a Jealousie of the Kings being in the Bottom of his Design; which was often insinuated by the Council of Officers at London, in their public and private Debates: So that in the immaturity of that time, nothing could more advance Monck's purpose of subduing the English Army, than to beget a Confidence in them of his adherence to his Declaration.

This Practice prevail'd so far, as to get the Council of State together in London, where they had many private Meetings: But in the mean time, the Commissioners for the Independent Churches, which were sent into Scotland, were solicitous to divert Monck from the prosecution of the War; and so far the Business proceeded, that there was a Conference appointed with them at Halswood-house, where were present to treat with them, General Monck, Colonel Fairfax, Colonel Syler, Doctor Barrow the Judge Advocate of the Army, and Mr. Gamble one of the Generals Chaplains.

At this Conference, Mr. Collins an Independent Minister, (who had been one of the Preachers of the late Council in Scotland) was admitted to be present as a Newer.

Mr. Caryl was the first that spoke, who in a long and studied Speech declared, That the Commissioners had desired him to speak for them; That they all came, not to deliver their own Sense of the Generals Proceedings but the Sense of the Churches, (for so upon every occasion he call'd the Independent Congregations; That the Churches had not given them Commission to enter into the Merits of the Cause, nor to Debate whether Lamberts Action of turning out the Parliament were justifiable or not; but only to present it to his Lordship, as their Opinion; That though that Action could not be justified, yet his Lordship had not a Call to appear against it, in that manner that he then did; That his Lordship had only in Charge to keep Scotland in quiet, and was not bound to take notice of any Differences that should happen in England. (Nor indeed could it reasonably be expected of him, he being in a place where he could not be supposed to have such true and timely Information, as was necessary in a Business of that Consequence.) He proceeded to shew Reasons, why the General should go on no further, telling him, That it would put a strife amongst those that hitherto had been Brethren engaged all along in the same Cause, Partakers in the same Dangers, and the same Successes, amongst those that still in their Papers, and all their Addresses, call'd and own'd one another for Brethren, and that at a very unreasonable time, whilst the Canonic and Perizites were in the Land: And thereupon he took occasion, to enlarge himself upon all the Advantages the King and his Party would reap by this Quarrel, and all the Dangers the People of God (for so he call'd his own Party) might run into; And at last, by way of Aggravation, he told the General, That what Inconveniences sever should happen, would be laid at his Door, in regard he would appear to have been the Beginner of the War.

At this the General, in a little heat, interrupted him, saying, That the War was already begun by Lambert and his Party, who had offer'd violence to those from whom they had all received their Commissions; not sparing freely and at large to lay open their restless Instability, which would not suffer the Three Nations to enjoy any settled Government at all, but kept them in a perpetual Circumlocution, till they were in danger to be brought to utter Ruine; repeating much of their Declarations, and many of their Actions; and declaring, That if they continued in that Course he was resolv'd to oppose them to the uttermost, and would (to repeat his own words) lay them on their Backs.

Caryl and his Fellow-Commissioners endeavour'd to excuse that Expression of theirs, which stirr'd up the Generals Anger; and Barrow, on the General's side, did qualify and mitigate his Answer, not thinking it meet wholly to disoblige so considerable a Party as the Independents, as things

A things stood at that time; and so by degrees Expressions came to be very calm on both sides, both being in Expectation of the Issue of the Treaty then on foot, between the Commissioners of the Army of Scotland, and those of the Army in England; but after this time, there was no more Meetings, for upon News from England, that Matters were tending to Accommodation, these Commissioners thought their Business done, and made hast to return to London.

Charles disabled by his Fall, could not get soon enough to London, to prevent the hasty Conclusion of the Treaty there, (which was concluded on the 15th of November) although he endeavour'd by several Letters to Major Knight, one of the Commissioners, to prevent it, for as much as the rest of them were to prevail'd on by the Impunity of the English Officers, or else to terrified with their great Preparations, that he could not hinder the speed of it: As he came to London, he pass'd by Cambridge, and settled there a Correspondency with Mr. Pradman, one of the Fellows of Kings-Colledge, by whose Care and Secrecy all his Packets were conveyed safe to Scotland, when all the ordinary Ways were obstructed. Mean while, being much troubled to find, that that very Night he arriv'd at London, the Treaty betwixt the Commissioners on both parts was concluded, he seriously expostulated with the Commissioners about their precipitant proceeding, telling them what Progress he had made in his Negotiations, and that by the middle of January, there would be in many Places such strong Divisions made, that the General could not but obtain his Ends: That his Money would last till the beginning of February, and by that means his Men would be so united and encouraged, that if he did nothing but lye still, Lambert's Army by their great wants (which made them insupportable to the Country) must break of themselves.

Knight was very sensible of his Error in this hasty Conclusion, and the rest were so far convinc'd, that in their Letter of the 16th of November, to the General-Council of the Officers of the Army in Scotland, giving them an Account of the Conclusion of the Treaty, They confess, they had exceeded their Instructions, out of a Suspicion, as the Posture of Affairs then stood, That the Issue of the Difference, if longer continued, would not be to the Advantage of themselves, or of their Brethren of England, but of the Common Enemy.

The Agreement itself consisted of Nine Articles, which were expressed in the following words, ¶ 12.

1. That we will, to the uttermost of our Powers, in our several Capacities, oppose the Interest and pretended Right of Charles Stewart, in and to the Government of these Nations, as also of all and every Person claiming a Right or Title to the said Government, or any share therein; together with, under, or from him, or any other Person or Persons pleading or pretending such a Right or Title, by virtue of his or their Descent from the same Line with him.

2. That we will not give our Consent unto, but will oppose to our utmost Power, the setting up of any Single Person whatsoever, in the Place of, and for the Chief Magistracy of these Nations; and will endeavour to our utmost, That the Government of these Nations, may be settled in the way of a Free-States, or Common-wealth, without a Single Person, Kingship, or House of Lords.

3. That no Form of Government shall be determined of, and asserted by any part of the Army, as the Supreme Legislative Authority of this Commonwealth, and the Territories thereto belonging, without the Approbation and Consent of a General-Council of the Officers of the Army and Navy of this Commonwealth; which General-Council shall consist of two Commission-Officers for each respective Regiment, chosen by the Commission-Officers of the said Regiment, or by the major part of them, who can conveniently meet together; and likewise such Governours of Garrisons, as are not Regimented, and can conveniently be spared, may be call'd to the said Council, and ten Officers of the Fleet, chosen by a Council of the Officers of the Fleet; And that the Quorum shall be Thirty-one, and the Day of their Meeting to be the Sixth of December next at White-Hall in the Old Council Room.

4. That a Parliament, or a Supreme Delegated Authority of this Commonwealth, be with all possible speed constituted and Summoned in such manner and form, as shall be by the aforesaid General Council agreed unto; and the Qualifications of the Members thereof, to be agreed on by the Lord St. John, the Lord Warriston, Lieutenant-General Eudlow, Sir Henry Vane, Lord Whitlock, Sir James Harrington, Major Salway, Colonel George Thompson, Colonel Berry, and Mr. Scot; together with the Lord Steel, Colonel Barrow, and Lieutenant-Colonel Dobson, as Commissioners for the Army in Ireland, and three Commissioners for the Army in England, to be appointed thereunto; with the three Commissioners for the Army of Scotland; whereof the Quorum to be Nine.

5. That the Proportion of Money out of the Assessments of England, formerly appointed for the Supply of the Forces of Scotland, be duly paid, and no further stop upon the same, but that it may be return'd by Bills of Exchange, or otherwise with all convenient speed, and any former Order and Orders to be made void.

6. That the Case of Officers of the Army of England and Scotland, that are suspended or displaced, or that have laid down their Commissions since the 11th of October last, onely by reason of the present Differences, be determined by fourteen Commissioners of the Army in England and Scotland, or the major part of them; the one half of the said Commissioners to be chosen by the Council of Officers in England, and the other half of the Council of Officers in Scotland; and that forthwith the said Officers be discharged from their Imprisonments or Confinements. The Day of Meeting of the said Commissioners, to be the first Day of December next, and the place of their Meeting to be at Newcastle upon Tyne.

7. That no Officer or Soldier, or other Person of these Nations, that have acted in the late Differences betwixt the late Parliament and the Army, or between any of the Forces of this Commonwealth, for or against each other, relating to any Difference, since the 10th of October last, be question'd for the same, but fully indemnified, and all unkindness to be put in perpetual Oblivion.

8. That a Godly, Learned, and Faithful Ministry, with competent Maintenance, and other Encouragement, be continued in the Three Nations; and that the Universities and Schools of Learning be so countenanced and reformed, as that they may become the Nurseries of Piety and Learning.

9. That the Forces of Horse and Foot respectively, both of England and Scotland, that have been drawn forth by reason of the late difference, shall forthwith March to such Quarters in both Nations, where they may best secure and preserve the Peace of the Commonwealth against the Enemies thereof; and that there be no further difference or appearance of difference amongst us.

We the Commissioners hereunto appointed and authorized by General Monk, and the Generall Council of Officers in Scotland, do this 15th of November, 1659, in the name and on the behalf of the said General Monk, and Generall Council of Officers in Scotland, fully Consent and agree to the aforementioned Agreement, and every part thereof, and do engage our selves and every of us to the full performance of the same.

Wallington and Lloyd, Two Captains of the English Army at London, were sent with this Agreement to General Monk to put it in execution; and as they went, Major Cambridge of Lambeth's Army was sent by him in their Company. But Clarges was careful to send a Copy of it to him some days before they arrived; and the General was in much perplexity at the Receipt of it, as that which distressed his Designs almost past recovery; and was resolv'd not to accept of it, but could not well tell how to decline it.

To take any pretence from those Articles which excluded the Kings Government, would confirm the suspicion which was fomented of his secret Intentions for the Royal Family; and to ground his dissent from the Subscription of the Commissioners, where they assume an authority (which they never had) and undertook for the performance of that Agreement for the General and all his Officers, would not be thought material enough to continue the breach betwixt them: That which was most plausible, was to break it upon the Sixth Article, where it was provided, That all the Officers displaced by General Monk, might be in a Capacity of being restored to their Commands; and all those put by him in their places (wherein his strength consisted) be removed; He call'd together a few of his Confidants to advise what to do; These were Major General Morgan, Colonel Fairfax, Colonel Lydeott, Doctor Barrow, and Mr. Gumble; Lydeott was admitted, because he was from a private Captain newly prefer'd to the Command of Cobbe's Regiment, and therefore by interest suppos'd to be averse to this Agreement. The General and these Gentlemen having had much discourse of the business, They all thought it fit to disapprove of the Agreement, but offered in the manner; but as it was by Barrow proposed, and agreed to by the General and the rest, That they should not declare a positive dissent to what their Commissioners had done; but urge, That there was something untreat'd of, further to be agreed upon; and some of those things consented by their Commissioners, which without further explication, could not stand with their Declaration or Instructions; and that therefore it should be desir'd, that two more might be allowed to be added to their Commissioners, to meet a like number of theirs to be thereunto authorized, to put a more absolute period to their differences.

The said Evening, Wallington, Lloyd, and Cambridge arriv'd; and the next morning at a Generall Council of Officers at Edinburgh, when the Agreement was communicated to them, they were so artificially prepar'd, that they unanimously disallow'd it, and a Letter was fram'd, which they all subscrib'd, to the same purpose with what was agreed on the day before, and Lloyd and those with him went with it to London.

The City of London was very much discontented at the Committee of Safety, and Fleetwood became doubtful of them: But to heighten them the more, General Monk sent a Letter to the Lord Mayor and Common Council, which was delivered to them by Mr. Atkins, and Colonel Markham, about the 17th or 18th of November: Wherein he acquainted them,

That at the first notice he had of the Force upon the Parliament, he had sent a Letter to them, declaring his Resolution to endeavour their Re-establishment, and that his Army was very unanimous to Concur with him in it; but that Letter miscarrying, he had with the advice of his Officers now again written to them, to let them know, they were constant to their first Resolution; and were the more confirm'd in it, for being informed that the authors of that Force had proceeded so far, as to null and make void some Acts of Parliament, (which the King when he was at the highest never attempted to do, and which no true Englishman can endure to see done by any but Parliaments themselves) and after they had subverted the Foundation of an ancient Government, were contriving by their own power and authority to set up a new Government over the Nations. Adding, That if this should be suffered, he knew not to what purpose so much Blood had been spilt; so much Treasure spent, and so many Engagements made; They must take upon themselves the Guilt of all, and look upon this Slavery they had brought upon themselves, as a Judgment upon them for their Murders, Rapines, and Perjuries: He protested to aim only at the restoring Parliaments to their former Freedom and Authority, and the People to their Just Rights and Liberties; in which he expected to be sure of their Assistance. As to Religion, he told them, he intended not that those that truly fear'd God should be abridg'd of their worship, but he should be unwilling that some under Pretence of maintaining that Liberty, should endeavour the overthrow of Nationall Ministry, and by consequence leave the greatest part of the People to utter Ignorance and Atheism: Concluding nevertheless, That Religion was not that about which he did at present contend, being desirous to leave that to the Consideration of the Parliament, for the Defence whereof, he and those with him were resolv'd to venture to the utmost; and if he should miscarry through want of their timely aid, it would be too late for them by their own strength to assert their Freedom: And if he succeeded, it would be dishonourable for so Famous a City, and so much Concern'd, that its Liberty should be asserted without its own help; inciting them therefore now whilst so great an Army is waiting on him in the North, to use their Endeavours in the South, &c.

This Letter was dated the 12th of November at Edinburgh, and did so much incense the Committee of Safety, that the Gentlemen who delivered it were put into Custody: And the more to aggravate the business, Monk's Commissioners were either so imprudent or so unsincere, as to declare, That they believ'd the Letter was seditious; Which made the City less Active in pursuance of the Contents of it.

Whilst things were thus travell'd in London, Fleetwood, Lambert, and all the Officers in England, could not dissimble their Confusion of Mind, upon Monk's refusal to ratify the Treaty, and sending for a Blank Pass to insert new names of additional Commissioners, and many expostulatory Letters pass'd betwixt them about it, but more especially betwixt Lambert and his Officers and him; for they were very apprehensive, that this Motion of a Blank Pass for adding to their Commissioners, or the naming of new ones, was only meant to gain time; but but at last they did consent to it, though it never came to any effect, as shall be hereafter dis- covered.

Nine of the old Council of State met privately in London the 19th of November, they a little resented, that General Monk's Commissioners did not Communicate their Councils with them, yet omitted not to give him all the encouragement they could; And in order thereunto, one Captain Elms, with Horton a Servant of Sir Arthur Haslerigg's, was sent with a Letter to him to Scotland; Wherein they signified,

That his Faithfull Actions in discharge of his Trust and Duty to that Parliament, and for the good of the Three Nations and Poplery in these times of so great Hypocrisie and Defection, was most gratefully acknowledged by them; and they assur'd him, his Service was exceedingly well resented by all sober and interestd persons that love a Commonwealth; and that he might be confident, that they would adhere to him, and to their utmost promote the good Cause which he had hitherto with so much wisdom and Courage highly own'd, and that it was their Resolution to stand and fall with him in defence thereof; and that they would, as occasion should offer it self, the Lord enabling, be assisting to him according to his Declarative for removing the Force from this Parliament, that so they may Sit with Freedome, and by Gods Blessing, lay a Foundation of a happy and lasting Settlement.

This was a great Encouragement to the Officers in Scotland; for the wisest of them did conclude from these appearances of Action at London, that their Party was increased in England, Imagining that otherwise they durst not have so openly acted.

Colonel Whitham at Portsmouth was labouring to frame a Design of declaring for Generall Monk with that Garrison; And Colonel Morley, Walton, and Haslerigg went privately towards him to Treat about it: But before they went, The Council of State, at another meeting before the time appointed by Parliament for their Continuance was expired, framed a Commission, wherein they Constituted General Monk absolute Commander in Chief of all the Armies in England and Scotland, which was Dated the 24th of November, Sealed with their Seal, and left in the hands of Clerges, till a safe Messenger might be sent with it to him.

As soon as Fleetwood had received Generall Monk's Letters against the Ratification of the Treaty, and his desire to have Two more Commissioners added to his, to renew the Treaty at New-Castle, Wilks, Cloberry, and Knight, the Commissioners, had their dispatch, and a Pistle to licence their repair thither; But before they got to New-Castle, at a Meeting of all Lambert's Officers, a Letter was fram'd, and sent by Colonel Zanchy to Generall Monk's Officers, and one from Lambert to the Generall himself.

In that from the Officers they write, That they had advis'd their Generall to acquaint Generall Monk, that if he pleas'd to appoint two Commission'd Officers of his Army to be added to those already in England, and signify their names to him, a safe Conduct should be forthwith given to them; but withall, That nothing in the Agreement be parted from, nor any new matter, or further explanations admitted, which are not consistent to what is already concluded; And that the Generall Council (agreed upon in the third Article of the Agreement at London,) to meet upon the sixth of December, may accordingly hold their meeting. And in a Postscript to this Letter, they complained of the detention of Colonel Cobbet, who, they said, was a publick Messenger, and desired therefore he might enjoy his Privilege accordingly except by some miscarriage he had forfeited the same. Colonel Zanchy was very kindly receiv'd by Generall Monk and all his Officers, and they met together with all convenient haste to give him his dispatch, acquainting him, That they should not disown anything in that Agreement that was conformable to the Instructions by which their Commissioners were authoriz'd; but what should appear to be beyond, they insisted to have it Treated on and explain'd. As to the third Article mentioned in their Letter, they would not admit of any meeting in pursuance of it, till the whole should be concluded. And concerning Cobbet, they alleadg, That he came not to Scotland as a publick Messenger, but as a Colonel to Command a Regiment after his Commission had been vacated by the Parliament (the day before their Interruption) and without any leave from Generall Monk; And that the Generall had intimation from a Person of Credit, That he had a design to seduce the Army from their obedience, if not to seize on his person. This Letter was signed the 7th of December at night, and the next day Colonel Zanchy was to have returned with it to Newcastle; but upon Intelligence receiv'd, that a Party of Lambert's consisting of three Regiments of Horse, and a Regiment of Dragoons, with two Drakes, was march'd into Northumberland, and that sixty Dragoons had possessed themselves of Chillingham Castle, near the Scotch Borders. The Colonel was stay'd, and the Generall at three of the Clock the next morning, march'd out of Berwick, and sent order to draw his Forces together together towards Coldstream, a very convenient Pistle upon the Tweed, where he seized his Head Quarters. A little before this, his own Commissioners were come to him to Berwick, where he confid Col. Wilks for discovering, or at least, not pursuing some private Instructions; but after a while, he was releas'd, upon satisfaction that what he did was out of Ignorance, and not malice.

Colonel Whitham at Portsmouth, very generously declar'd for Generall Monk with that Garrison, after he had secur'd Captain Penock and Captain Brown, and some other refractory Officers, that he was jealous of.

Commissioners from the severall Shires and Burroughs of Scotland, being sent to wait upon the Generall, and he having appointed them, to be at Berwick the 13th of December, he came on that day thither to meet them accordingly, releasing Zanchy, and sending by him a Letter to Lambert, wherein he acquainted him, he would by the next Post more fully inform him of his Resolutions.

The Scotch Commissioners appointed five to attend the Generall, and treat with him, which were the Earls of Glencairn, Rothes, Wemyss, and Eglington, and Mr. Alexander Bruce. These presented a Paper to the Generall, consisting of five Proposals.

1. That the Lord Generall may be pleas'd to appoint a Committee in each Shire, for regulating the Affaires thereof, in order to his Lordships Commands; and their own preservation.
2. That his Lordship will allow each Shire presently to raise (for securing the Peace and their own safety) some small proportion of Horses, under the Conduct of such Persons as his Lordship shall think fit to trust.
3. That his Lordship will declare, for the greater Encouragement of the Shires, at the return of their Commissioners, if the Treaty shall break up, and take no effect, immediately upon the notice thereof, that he did authorize the Shires to put themselves in the best posture they can for his Assistance, and their own defence.
4. That for the said effect, his Lordship will be pleas'd to furnish each Shire with some proportion of Arms, upon payment of just Rates thereof, within one Moneths time after the Receipt of them.
5. That all Gentlemen who are free to comply with his Lordships desires, may for themselves and Servants, have liberty to carry their Arms.

The Generall, upon the receipt of this Paper, advis'd with some select Officers about an Answer to it (viz.) Colonel Fairfax, Major Jeremiah Smith, Colonel Lydcott, Colonel Read, and Doctor Barrow. And the chief Question debated on was, whether they should permit the Scots to Arm for their Assistance: Colonel Read was for Arming them, He Argued, That it was a common danger, and they ought to make use of any aid that could be obtained for their defence. The Generall himself told them, That if he should draw all the men from his Garrisons, he could make his numbers of Foot quickly equal to Lambert, but he had hitherto declined that, being unwilling to put Scotland out of English hands, and that he doubted not, if he could get a few more Horse than he had, even with those Foot he had without weakening his Garrisons, he should well enough defend himself against Lambert.

Others were of opinion, That although they should not employ whole Troops, or Companies of Scots, yet they might safely mingle a good party of them with the English. But Doctor Barrow was against all motions of Arming the Scots at that time, believing, if it were done, many of their own men might desert them; But if the Generall would take any opportunity, though it were but to bear up any of Lambert's Quarters, so that they might once come to Blend, that the division being likely to increase after such an action, he might then strengthen himself with what accessions he pleas'd. Nevertheless, he mov'd that some privately might confer with the leading men of the Scotch Gentry, to try if they would be brought to provide any numbers of Horses, on which the Generall might mount English to re-inforce his own Troops. This last was approved as to the main Question; but upon the whole debate, they agreed upon particular Answers to every Article, in the Generalls name.

To the First, That he would authorize the Noblemen and Justices of the Peace of each County, with the Advice and Consent of the Governour of the next adjacent Garrison, to put in execution such Orders and Commands as his Lordship shall give for securing the Peace of the County.

To the second, That he would allow the Counties next adjacent to the Highlands, viz. to the Counties of Dumbarton and Sterling, Forty Men to bear Arms; To the County of Perth, Forty men in Arms; To the County of Forfar and Kinkardine, Forty men in Arms; And to the County of Aberdeen, Forty men in Arms, which are to be a Guard for the security of the said Counties against Thieves and Robbers. And for the rest of the Shires, his Lordship would take care, if he should have occasion to remove farther ther out of Scotland: And he would allow the Heretors of the above named Shires, to make choice of a fit Person to Command the said respective Guards: They giving Security to the Governour of the next adjacent Garrison for their Fidelity and good Behaviour, in Six hundred Round Shillings.

3. To the Third, His Lordship deferred his Answer, till the Issue of the Treaty now intended between him and the English Army.

4. To the Fourth, That he would furnish them with fit means for their defence, whenever he should apprehend their Peace and Safety to be in eminent danger.

5. To the Fifth, Such Noblemen and Gentlemen as should subscribe to live peaceably, and do nothing to the prejudice of England, should have Liberty with Passes to wear their Swords, and have four Servants Armed for their Attendants.

And Conference with the Scotch Commissioners, upon the delivery of these Answers to their Propositions, they seem'd unsatisfied with them, and the Earl of Glencairn, in the name of the rest, told the General, Since they were willing to hazard their Persons and Estates with him, They hoped he would not deny them to Arm for his Assistance, and their own safety, since if he should engage, and be worsted, they should be exposed to great ruin for their Affection and respect to him, from which otherwise by a Generality they might be secure. To which he answered, That if that should happen, they should then Arise to what numbers they pleased. To this the Earl replied, That the Country were now willing to rise in Confiance of his Conduct and Courage. But if his force should be defeated, they would not be persuaded to it. And besides, they could not under six weeks time, make their Levies. And if permission were now deny'd, the Enemy, if Victorious, would be in their bowels, before they should be in a posture of Defence.

The cautious General would not be prevailed on with these Arguments, and so they departed, he return'd to Coldstream to his Quarters, and the Scotch Noblemen and Gentlemen, to their severall Countries.

They had absolutely refused the raising any Horse to mount English, yet this came to no breach between them and the General, in regard, before they left Barwick, the General acquainted them with Intelligence he had received from England, of the distractions in the English Armies, and other affairs, which made them to fear less than before their own Peace at home, and so all parted with mutual respect.

After this meeting, the General was contriving how to break off the Treaty with Lambert, which he had hitherto not without great Artifice delay'd; but he considered, that as soon as that should be done, Lambert would march towards him, and therefore he made preparation to fight him, if occasion should urge him to it. In order to which, he sent an express to Clarges, to provide him some good Horse-Officers, and send them by Sea in a nimble Barke. Mean while, in Northumberland the Eagles rais'd him two compleat Troops, and more Horse were raising, He increased his number of Pikes in each Company, to be equal to his Muskets, as thereby to be better able to make defence against Horse, in which Lamberts greatest strength was plac'd.

Coldstream was nine miles from Barwick, upon the Tweed, and he had Quartered all his men so conveniently, that he could draw them all together in six hours; for the Villages are much thicker upon the Scotch than English Borders. And if Lambert march'd towards him, the Villages in Northumberland being thin, he must have Quartered at such distance, that his men would have been exposed to great hazard of being often disturb'd in their Quarters. And if he had march'd to fight; the General being upon the defensive part, could have brought as many hands to action as he. Or if he had march'd to Carlisle, to have invaded Scotland that way; Monk would then have march'd directly to London, and should have been two or three dayes march before him. Or if he had divided his Army, the General would have presently fallen on the nearest part to him.

In this posture he lay at Coldstream, when he received Intelligence from Clarges, that there were many great differences in London, betwixt Fleetwood and the City. That the Apprentices, and severall others in favour of him, had many Consultations to make disturbances, That they were framing a Petition to the Lord Major and Common Council, to press their Interposition for the restoring of the Parliament, and preservation of Magistracy, which was endeavour'd to be suppress'd by the Committee of Safety, who emitted a Proclamation to prohibit all gathering of hands to Petitions, which incens'd the young men so much (being fomented by wiser heads) that they rose in many places in a tumultuous manner. And thereupon, Colonel Hewson was sent into London, to many places in a tumultuous manner. And thereupon, Colonel Hewson was sent into London, to many places in a tumultuous manner.

That he had sent Captain Goodwin with some Horse-Officers to him by Sea to Barwick, and that Goodwin had his Lordships Commission for Commander in Chief, of all the Armies in England and Scotland. And that he had treated with Mr. Philip Howard, who had undertaken to raise

A raise an hundred Gentlemen well Arm'd and mounted in Northumberland and Cumberland, on Condition to Command them for his Life-Guard, which he had promised his Lordship should consent to; but that just as he was preparing for his Journey, he was taken with the Small Pox, but his elder Brother in the mean time, had writ and undertook to promote the Levies of the men; That he had treated with Colonel Redman, a gallant Horse-Officer, and Colonel Bret, who had been both by Ludlow removed from their Commands, to draw off the Irish Brigade from Lambert, many of the men having been before Commanded by them, and therefore easily persuaded, and that Colonel Morley, Sir Arthur Hazlerig, and Colonel Walton, were Active in Portsmouth, and all the Foot which were sent to besiege that Town, had seized on their Officers, and carried them Prisoners into it, and five Troops of Colonel Rich his Regiment, and two of

B Colonel Barries, were come in to them; That those of Barries, were Commanded by Colonel Crooke, who was lately their Major, and is sent into the Isle of Wight, where his Forces are increased to Seven hundred: And at Tannion, and several other places, there was great defection amongst all the Souldiers; That Sir Michael Livesey in Kent, had raised two Regiments, and Colonel Gibbon was joyned with him, and Vice Admiral Lawson had with Two and Twenty Sail, declared for the Parliament, and was come into the Hope, stopping up the River of Thames. And the Black-houses near Gravesend, on both sides the River, had also Declared. (A Considerable Instrument in that, was Sireater the Controller of the Ordnance, who endeavour'd to beget a Right Understanding between General Monk and the Fleet, and was Succesfull therein: He being then forced to fly thither for the safety of his Life, after he was betrayed to C the then Committee of Safety, for pursuing the Design of Securing the Tower of London, by the Advice and Countenance of Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper, who most Prudently and Resolutely persisted in opposing the then Defection. In which, and all other Undertakings, Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper (with the rest of the Secluded Members) Contributed the utmost of his Endeavours, to bring about the Restauration of his Majesty.) That the Lord Mayor and several Aldermen, have had many ineffectual Treaties with Fleetwood, and the Chief of the Army and Committee of Safety; the City demanding the management and Conduct of their own Militia, and the instant restauration of the Parliament, or the calling another, which are refused to them, and the discontents thereby much augmented.

Upon Receipt of these Letters, the General writ to Lambert, by Major Banister, one of the Officers at Barwick, acquainting him, That since his last by Lanchy, he had certain Advice That three of the Commissioners appointed by Act of Parliament, for the Government of the Army, were now in Portsmouth, acting by virtue of the same Authority, upon which he Acted, and declaring for the same ends. And that he and the Army were thereby obliged in Honour and Duty, to take their Advice and Consent in all Affairs that relate to the Cause they are now engaged in, which he doubted not, but he would judge reasonable and necessary; and therefore he desired a safe Conduct for the Major, to acquaint them with what had passed in the several Overtures betwixt them; but withall, he told him freely, he could not think it advisable to proceed further in Treaty (and he expelled the other Commissioners would be of the same mind) till he remanded all those Troops he had sent into Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmerland, during that time.

E Lambert upon advice with his Officers, would not let Banister passe, but sent him back to Barwick; for he now began plainly to perceive, that the General intended nothing less than to treat further; whereupon both sides prepared for War: But Lambert was so daily Alarm'd with the success of the Commissioners at Portsmouth, and the daily submission of several Troops and Companies of men, That he thought it more necessary to march Southward to assist his Friends in London, than hazard Battail with Gen. Monk.

At which time, Fleetwood with the rest of his Committee of Safety, were in no less disorder; for perceiving every hour, that some of their Souldiers forsook their party, they abandon'd all: And Fleetwood with great Contrition and submission, in behalf of the rest of his Confederates, sent to the Speaker, to desire him to send to the rest of the Parliament Members; and with them to return to the exercise of their Trust and Power for the Government of the Nation; acknowledging, That the Lord had blasted their Councils, and (to repeat his own words) spit in their faces.

Upon this, several Members met privately in the Speakers House, and gave Colonel Okey, Colonel Markham, Colonel Alured, and Colonel Moss, orders to draw the Regiments about Westminster, to a Rendezvous in Lincoln-Inne-fields; which being performed accordingly, the Souldiers declared to live and dye with the Parliament, and march'd down Chaucery-Lane, where at the Rolls they made a halt till the Speaker came to them, and received their acknowledgements, and from thence by his Orders, they went to their Quarters, having first from him received the Word.

G And two dayes after, that is to say, on the 16th of December, in the Evening, the Speaker and the Members of Parliament, refused the Government, and sat in the Parliament-House, having met first in White-Hall in the Council-Chamber, from whence they went on foot through Channon-Rowe (the Mace being carried before the Speaker) to Westminster-Hall, where as they pass'd, the Souldiers upon the Guard stood in Ranks, and made acclamations. At their first meeting, They ordered, Colonel Alexander Popham, Col. Thompson, Mr. Scot, Col. Okey, Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper, Colonel Matthew Alured, and Colonel Markham, or any three of them, to

Mr. Evelyns attempt to bring over Colonel Morley to the King.

In the 7 19th Page of this History, though we deferred, we do not yet forget to insert a very material Negotiation for his Majesty's Service, attempted upon the Interruption given to the Parliament by Col. Lambert, and those that joyn'd with him therein, which was managed by one Mr. Evelyn of Say's Court near Deptford in Kent, an Active, Vigilant, and very Industrious Agent on all occasions for his Majesty's Restoration; who upon conjecture that the Members of this supposititious Parliament could not but ill resent that affront, endeavour'd to make an advantage of fixing the impression of it to the ruine of the Army: for the effecting whereof, he applied himself to Coll. Herbert Morley, then newly Constituted one of the Five Commissioners for the Command of the Army, as a Person by his Birth, Education, and Interest, unlikely to be cordially inclin'd to prostitute himself to the Ruine of his Country, and the Infamy of his Posterity.

Mr. Evelyn gave him some Visits to attemper his affection by degrees to a confidence in him, and thence by consequence to engage him in his Designs; and to induce him the more powerfully thereunto, he put into his hands an Excellent and unanswerable hardy Treatise by him written, and several times reprinted, intituled, An Apology for the Royall Party; which he back'd with so good Arguments, and dextrous Addresses, that after some private discourse, the Colonel was so well inclin'd, as to recommend to him the procurement of his Majesty's Grace for him, his Brother-in-law Mr. Fagg, and one or two more of his Relations. This, Mr. Evelyn faithfully promised to endeavour, and taking the opportunity of Sir Samuel Tuke's going at that time into France, he by him acquainted the King (being then at Pontois with the Marquis of Ormond, and others of his Council) with the Transaction of this Affair, whereupon he was so well pleas'd, as to declare, If Col. Morley, and those for whom he interceded, were not of those execrable Judges of his Blessed Royall Father. (as indeed some of the List had most injuriously presented him) they should have his Pardon, and he receive such other Rewards as his Services should deserve.

Upon the transmitting this advice to the King, the Colonel left London, because of the Jealousie which Fleetwood and Lambert had of him; but before he went, he desired Mr. Evelyn to Correspond with him in Sussex, by the means of Mr. Fagg his Brother-in-law, who then lay in the Mines.

Mr. Evelyn had good reason to believe Col. Morley very capable of serving his Majesty at this time, as having much a better Interest in Sussex, than any of the Party; whereby he might have facilitated the King's Reception in that County, in case His Affairs had required his Landing there, of which there were then some deliberations: But besides his Power in Sussex, he had, as he affirmed, an Influence on Two of the best Regiments of the Army, and good Credit with many of the Officers of the Fleet.

But before there could be any return from France of the King's determination in this matter, there intervened many little Changes in the posture of Affairs.

Upon the advance of Generall Monk in favour of the Parliament, and the universal inclination of the Army to him, Colonel Morley expected the restitution of that Power, and with it, of his own Authority, and was Leagued with Walton and Haslerigg in a private Treaty with Colonel Witham the Governour of Portsmouth, for the delivery of that Garrison to them; whilst Fagg kept aside privately from London, to raise a Regiment in Sussex to promote these Designs, but was suppress'd before he got any considerable Numbers of Men together.

Mr. Evelyn in the interim of these intrigues, in vain endeavour'd by all imaginable wayes to communicate the King's Pleasure to Colonel Morley, who was by this time in the Garrison of Portsmouth.

But when the Parliament re-assum'd their Power; and he was plac'd in the Government of the Tower of London, he thought it expedient to renew the former Negotiation between them for his Majesty's Service, as being then in a Post of most advantage for it; and in order thereunto, he often by Visits made application to him, but could never above once procure access, which ending onely in a Complement, and an uncertain answer, put Mr. Evelyn into a resolution of surmounting the difficulty of access, by writing freely to him in this manner:

That he came with a design to Congratulate his return, and the new Charge he had acquir'd, because he was perswaded he affected it onely for that noble advantage which he had more particularly discour-

sed to him, had his weighty Concernments favour'd him with an opportunity, or with the intercourse he promis'd him. But since his late attempts at the Tower made him despair of that happiness, he had presum'd to write to him, and to assure him of his earnest desires to serve him in something which should conduce to his honour, and to a stability of it beyond all that any present appearances could promise; That he was confident he had a nobler Prospect upon the success of the late Design, than to prostitute his Virtue and his Conduct to subserve the Passion or Avarice of any particular persons whatsoever, striving to enrich themselves with the spoiles which they daily ravish'd from their miserable Country, and for which they so zealously pursued the ruine of it, by labouring to involve men of the best Natures, and Reputation, into their own inextricable Labyrinths: That there was now an opportunity put into his hands, by improving whereof, he might securely act for the good of his Country, the redemption of it from the insupportable Tyranny, Injustice and Impiety, under which it had ground for so many years, through the treachery of many wicked, and the mistakes of some well natur'd men: In short, That by this, he should oblige even those whom they mistook for their greatest Enemies, to embrace and cherish him as a Person meriting the Honour of a brave and worthy Patriot, and to reward him with the noblest expressions of it, when by the best Interpretation of his Charity in obedience to the Divine dictates, he should thus heap Coals of Fire upon their heads, which would at once give both light and warmth to this afflicted Nation, Church, and People, not to be extinguish'd any more by those Impostors, whom God had so signally blown off the Stage, to place such in their stead, as had opportunities given them of restoring us to our Ancient Laws, native and most happy Liberties: That it was this which he held himself oblig'd to wish, to remind him off, to encourage him in, and to pronounce as the sincerest testimony of his Congratulations for his Return. And that having said thus much, he hoped he would not look on his Letter as any servile Address; but if he still retain'd that Favour to, and Confidence of the Person who presented it, which he had reason to promise himself, he conjur'd him to believe that he had made a perfect acquisition of his Service; and that however events might succeed, the Consideration onely of having done what became him, would return him abundant satisfaction. Finally, That he was still the same Person greedy of an opportunity to recommend the integrity of his affection, by prosecuting the Service he once injoyn'd him, and which he hoped he should not find without some capacities of expressing in effects, as well as in words, &c.

This Letter, written about the beginning of January, produc'd no reply; but in this conjuncture, certainly the most formidable, fierce, and full of Confusion that ever England had seen since it was a Nation; it was most unsafe for any of the Royall Party to have been meddling, especially it being as yet so hard to make any comfortable Prognosticks from the discreet Motions out of Scotland. What it was which induc'd Col. Morley, (at the time of his being Lieutenant of the Tower, a Post that qualified him (as matters then stood) to have done what he pleas'd) to decline Commerce with Mr. Evelyn for the King's Service, Whether it was that he doubted of the Concurrence of his Officers and Soldiers, so long

Col. Sirard's Regiment; To Buckingham 3 Companies, to Northampton five Companies, and A to Newark upon Trent two Companies. The Confidence the General had of Colonel Sirard, in placing his Regiment in the midst of the Kingdoms, afterwards proved a good Expedient at the Breaking out of Lambert.
The Regiment belonging to Fleetwood; To Hereford two Companies, to Oxford four Companies, to Worcester four Companies.
Col. Moss's Regiment; To Cambridge five Companies, and to Ely five Companies.
Col. Fitch's Regiment; To Chichester five Companies, and the rest to Winchester.

The Disposition of those to be in London, were in this Order:

The General's own Regiment of Horse in the Mews, and in the Sirard.
Col. Knight's Regiment; To have four Troops in King Street, and Twiltie Street in Westminster, and two Troops in Holborn.
Col. Cloppher's Regiment; Two Troops in Southwark, one in Bishops-Gate-Street, and three in Smithfield.

Col. Read's Regiment in Somerset-house, the Strand, Long-Acre, Covent-Garden, and St. Martin's Lane.

Col. Lydcot's Regiment in Thauer-house, Peter-house, and Parts adjacent.
Col. Flubbert's Regiment, in Holborn, Smithfield, and Parts adjacent.

Col. Adair's Regiment in the Tower, and Parts adjacent.
The next Morning the General march'd towards Leicester, and he met Scot and Robinson, the Parliament's Commissioners, in the way to it, and they never parted with him, till he came to London.

The General's Answer, concerning the Oath of Abjuration. Scot and Robinson's Message to him from the House.

At Leicester the General expected to be attacked about the Oath of Abjuration, and was much troubled, to think how to divert it. Charges told him, He had a plain and a fair Answer to make to them; which was, That he heard many men of undoubted Integrity had refused the Oath, and till he came to London, to hear the Reasons on both sides, for the taking and refusing, he could not with Prudence resolve it. This Advice he follow'd, and succeeded in it. Scot and Robinson, at their first interview told him, That the Parliament had Ordered a Thousand Pounds a Year for ever, to be sent on him, and appointed them to wait on him with it; and to let him know, the sense the Parliament had of his great Services, and that they were providing Monies for his Soldiers, and were glad to hear of his repairing to London.

The General was never more put to it than in this Journey, to dissemble his Inclinations; For these men watch'd every moment of his time: At Harbrow Alderman Fowke, Alderman Vinay, and Mr. Bromfield, met him as Commissioners from the Lord Major, Aldermen, and Common-Council of London; and, at the same time, Sir John Norris, with many of the chief Gentry of Northamptonshire, welcom'd him into their County.

The Citizens, after a Congratulatory Speech, fell upon Particulars, for the general Settlement of the Kingdom; and Mr. Bromfield, in a handsome free Speech, after the enumeration of the several Calamities it lay under, as the best Remedy, proposed the re-admission of the Secluded Members, that the Parliament might be made full and free. Scot was so impatient at this, That he took the Words out of the Generals Mouth, and would not permit him to answer them. He told them, Now the Parliament had subjected the Military Power, to a due subordination to the Civil, they were free, and that having already given their Judgment in the Case of the Secluded Members, it did not become them to insist on their re-admission. Fowke endeavour'd to qualify what Bromfield had propos'd, by saying, He consider'd they were not oblig'd by their Instructions, to desire the Generals Mediation further, than that they might have all their own Members admitted, since it was unreasonable, that they should be Govern'd by a Parliament where they had not their Representatives.

This Discourse, on all sides, was manag'd with some heat; and the General was forc'd to comply with Scot and Robinson, in their Extravagancies, to preserve their Opinion of him, which made the Citizens part from him somewhat unsatisfied, and so they continued, till he sent Charges privately to give them a better understanding of his Intentions. But Sir John Norris, and the Northamptonshire Gentlemen, who were prepar'd to attend him at Northampton with an Address, were so much discourag'd, that they thought to decline it, till Doctor Barrow request'd Mr. Philip Howard, to advise them to proceed in their Intentions; and to assure them, That though they had not a satisfactory Answer, they might be sure it would produce a good Effect. At Northampton Sir John Norris deliver'd his Address; and as he march'd to St. Albans, several of the same nature were presented to him, from the Gentry of Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, Norfolk, and almost all Counties, which did all agree in the same Matter, (viz.) For the Resignation of the Members Secluded in the Year, 1648, and the filling up the Vacancies in Parliament, or else for the calling a full and free Parliament. All which were answer'd with much respect by him, although he durst not discover his approbation of their Desires; And it is very observable, That in all the Counties, so much Caution was observ'd, That no Gentlemen sign'd any of these Addresses, that had ever been engag'd in his present Majesties, or his Royal Fathers Cause, nor scarce any of the Sons of such.

Commissioners from the City, met the General at Hatfield.

They propos'd the re-admission of the Secluded Members. Scot ris'd up, opposeth them;

The General seems to comply with Scot and Robinson.

Sir John Norris, and the Gentlemen of Northamptonshire, make an Address to him. Several other Addresses, pleading for a Free Parliament.

1659.

At Bunstable the General consult'd Major Knight and Charges, about the filling up the Blanks, in the Letter prepar'd at Northampton, having had Thoughts to send it by Charges, Knight, or Clark, his Secretary: But upon further consideration, it was thought convenient, not to part with Knight, because his presence would be requisite with his Troops, if any Disorders should happen, upon their march to London; as for Clark, he was so necessary to be with the General, for the issuing our Orders, that he could not be spar'd: and for Charges, it was judg'd more expedient, that he should be sent before, to prepare a Party in the House; so that Lydcot was chosen to be sent, as one very good and fit to the Speaker, to whom he was near ally'd, and Friday was the Day infer'd for his March into London. And upon the next Dayes Consultation, which was Saturday in the Evening, the 28 of January, he was dispatch'd away: And on Monday the Letter was deliver'd, which caus'd a long and violent Debate: Hastlerigg told them, the Council of State had before agreed, that four Regiments of those in London should march out, and four of the Generals be admitted; but nothing prevail'd that he said against the Generals Letter: So that after a Debate, from eight in the Morning, to twelve at Noon, the Result was in these Words.

Monday, January the 30. 1659.

Upon Reading of a Letter from St. Albans, from General Monck, Dated the 28 of January, 1659. and two Lists therein.

Resolved upon the Question by the Parliament, That the Parliament doth agree with the Distribution of the Soldiers, according to these Lists.

Resolved upon the Question by the Parliament, That it be refer'd to the Commissioners of the Army, to see the Soldiers forthwith distributed accordingly.

Lydcot returns to the General, with the welcome News of these Votes, as well might it be so to him; for from the moment of the execution of them, which gave him the possession of London, he could not but think his Conduct would prove very ill, if he did not reduce the whole Armies, in the three Kingdoms, to his Obedience.

Captain Cuff, an Agent from Sir Charles Coote in Ireland, had attended the General, in all his March from Newcastle to London; and given him, from time to time, an account of all Occurrences, by which means, the General kept a strict Correspondence both with him, the Lord Broughill, and several others of the chief Officers there: Who, although they had reduced all that Kingdom to the Obedience of the Parliament, were nevertheless suspected by them; and Scot insinuated to the General, That notwithstanding all their Pretences, he had good grounds to believe, they had some other Interest in their Aims, than that of the present Parliament.

The General diverted this Jealousie, with assurances of their Fidelity, and that he would undertake for them; which allay'd the Suspicion for that time, or at least to rak'd it up in Ashes, that no Sparks outwardly appeared.

The Regiments that were to march from London, to give place to the General and his Regiments, had a Months Pay assign'd to them, to be paid at their Remove; but that did not hinder them from Muriny at their departure, especially those that Quarter'd at St. James's and Somerset-house, which was not without great Indultry of the Officers appear'd: Upon which follow'd about Midnight, an Insurrection in the City, where about six or seven hundred drew together, and by Beat of Drum about the Streets, invited others to joyn with them for a Free Parliament, and the Liberty of the City, in expectation to have the Soldiers joyn with them; but two Troops of Horse suddenly dispers'd most of them, and took the rest (about Eight and Thirty) Prisoners, which were the next Morning committed to Lambeth-house: This Insurrection, together with the Disorders of the Soldiers, so frighted the Council of State, that in the beginning of the fore-going Night, they had sent to the General, to march with all hast into London; but that was afterwards contradicted, and he drew not near the Town till the Morning, and in the Afternoon, the others being all march'd out, Tumults quieted, and all both within and without in a great Calm; He march'd with his Army by Grays-Inn-Lane into Holborn, and from thence down Chancery-Lane, and so through Temple-Barre, along the Strand, to White-Hall. The Three Regiments of Horse march'd first, and He in the Head of them gallantly mounted, with his Trumpets richly Habited before him, and several Led-Horses after him, with many of his Chief Officers, and several Persons of Honour and Quality; and after them march'd the Foot: The Speaker of the House met him in the Street near Somerset-house, where they Complemented each other: after which the General march'd on to White-Hall, and the Speaker went to the Rolls: As soon as the Soldiers were Quarter'd, and all the Guards set, the General was visit'd by several of the Council of State; and being invited to take his place there, he went, in Compliance with them: But when the Oath of Abjuration was tender'd, he refused it, for the Reason before-mentioned, and was therefore not admitted, whereupon he return'd to his Apartment. The next Day was spent in Visits to him, from all the Members of Parliament, and many other Persons of the highest Quality: Mr. Scot told him, The Parliament did intend on Monday, publicly in their House, to give him their Acknowledgments of his Service, and that they expected, he should there make publique Professions of his Affections to their Interest and Authority, and his Dislike of the Addresses to him, for the Secluded Members, and a Free Parliament.

Lydcot made choice of, for the carrying of the Generals Letter to the House, about the sending of their Soldiers out of the City.

The House consent to the Generals Desire.

The General hath constant Intelligence of all Affairs in Ireland, by means of Captain Cuff.

A Muriny among some of the Souldiers, that were to depart out of the City. ARist giveth the City, dispers'd by the Souldiers.

General Monck marcheth with his forces into the City of London.

He refuseth the Oath of Abjuration.

Scot inviteth him how to receive the intended Congratulations of the House.

1659.

He made little Answer to him, but that he was much oblig'd to them, for the Honour of so great a Respect, and should endeavour by his future Services, to give Evidences of his just Remenbrances of it.

It is observable, That from this time, in all the Orders to him from the Parliament, they called him only Commissioner Munk, and not General: And although yet no publique Order had superseded the Commission of Commander in Chief, sent to him by the Council of State, they allow'd him no Authority, but conjunct with others, whereof he took little notice, but proceeded as before in the sole Exercise of the Command of the Army. He was somewhat perplex'd, how to behave himself in the Parliament, in reference to the great Professions and Pretensions they expected from him, of his Aversions from the King and his Party, to ballance his refusing the Oath of Abjuration: but he was resolv'd to act in that occasion, as moderate as the Season would bear, and yet to temper his Speech so, as not altogether to fail their Expectations.

On Monday, which was the Sixth of February, he was brought to the Court of Wards by Scott, Robinson, and some other Members; after which, Scott acquainted the House with his being there; Whereupon the Sergeant with his Mace being sent to attend him, carried it before him; Scott and Robinson conducting him into the House, to a Place on the left Hand within the Barre, where a Carpet was laid with Velvet, wasfer for him to sit on.

As soon as he had made Obedience, the Speaker bid him sit down; but he desiring to be excused, and standing behind the Chair, the Speaker expressed himself to him in these words:

The Speakers Speech to him.

I have been a common Observation, that the lighter Passions have a loud Voice, but such as are of greater Magnitude are always silent: As it is in Passions, so in Actions also: Those of a lesser Dimension, are often magnified above their Measure, but Historians do commonly fail in the Expressions of Noble and Great Actions, and such are frequently less'n'd; and so it may well be in those of this Dayes Remembrance: The Infalible Author tells us, That in Judea is God known, and his Name is great in Israel; That Knowledge and Greatness of GOD is verified in the Instance of Martial Affairs, That the stout-hearted are spoiled, they have slept their sleep, and none of the Men of Might have found their Hands. This is verified this Day amongst us here present, that both We and You might acknowledge, that it is GOD, not Man, that hath perform'd this Great Work; that We his Creatures here may neither ascribe it to our wisdom, or our Valour, but that it was GOD alone, and none else. But yet I have always observ'd, that albeit the Glory appertains to the LORD, yet the Influence of that Glory extends it self to the Instruments in his hand; and thereby those Beames enlighten your Honour and Valour, as an especial Instrument; not as a Merit, but as a Reward upon your Prudence and wise Conduct. The Knowledge of what hath been done in this our Reformation, is not unknown in these Nations; I believe, to this Part of the World, how our Friends (as we conceiv'd) left us, and what Desolation hath been in Duty and Trust. The Face of this Land was covered with a Gloomy and Black Cloud, and the whole Nation left in the Judgment of Man, to the uttermost of Ruine: But, in that Condition, we did as the Prophet, in the greatest Misery of Israel, espy a little Cloud, no broader than a Hand, which is infinitely, in an instant, become the Refreshment of the whole Nation: That little Cloud was discern'd afar off in your Hands, and by the Prudence of your wise Conduct, it dispersed the Miseries of these Nations, and became a Glorious Mercy to them all. This House hath a true Resentment of your Prudence and Conduct in this great Work, and have commanded Me to return their hearty Thanks: But I must not end here, for they have also a full Sense of those Noble Commanders, Officers, and Souldiers, both of their Fidelity, Valour, and Duty, in this Expedition; And as I have return'd to You their Thanks, so it is their Desire, that you should return the same to Your Commanders, Officers, and Souldiers, who have been Instrumental in these Actions.

After he had ended, the Generall stood up and spake as followeth:

Mr. Speaker,

The Generals Speech, in Answer to the Speakers.

*A*mongst the many Mercies of God to these poor Nations, your peaceable Reformation is not the least; It is (as you said) his Work alone, and to Him belongs the Glory of it; and I esteem it as a great effect of his Goodness to me, that he was pleas'd to make me, amongst many worthier in your Service, some way Instrumental in it. I did nothing but my Duty, and deserve not to receive so great an Honour and Respect as you are pleas'd to give me at this

A "this time and place, which I shall ever acknowledg as a high mark of your Favour to me.

"SIR, I shall not now trouble you with large Narratives, only give me leave to acquaint you, That as I march'd from Scotland hither, I observ'd the People in most Counties in great and earnest expectations of a Settlement, and severall Applications were made to me with numerous Subscriptions to them; The chiefest Heads of their Desires were for a Free and a full Parliament, and that you would determine your Sitting; a Gospel Ministry, Encouragement of Learning and Universities, and for admittance of the Members seclused before the year 1648. without any previous Oath or Engagement. To which I commonly Answer'd, That you are now in a Free Parliament, and if there be any force remaining upon you, I would endeavour to remove it; and that you had Voted to fill up your House, and then you would be a full Parliament also; And that you had already determined your Sitting: And for the Ministry their maintenance, the Lawes and Universities, you had largely declared concerning them in your last Declaration; and I was Confident you would adhere to it: But as for those Gentlemen seclused in the year 1648. I told them, you had given Judgment in it, and all people ought to acquiesce in that Judgment; but to admit any Members to sit in Parliament without a previous Oath or Engagement, to serve the Government in being, it was never done in England.

"But although I said it not to them, I must say with pardon to you, That the less Oaths and Engagements are imposed, (with respect had to the Security of the Common Cause) your Settlement will be the sooner attain'd to. I am the more particular in these matters, to let you see how gratefull your present Consultations about these things will be to the People. I know all the sober Gentry will close with you, if they may be tenderly and Gently us'd; and I am sure you will so use them, as knowing it to be the common Concern to to amplify and not to lessen our Interest, and to be careful that neither the Cavaleer, nor Phanatique Party have yet a Share in your Civill or Military Power; of the last of whose Impatience to Government, you have lately had so severe experience. I should say something of Ireland and Scotland; Indeed Ireland is in an ill settled Condition, and made worse by your Interruptions, which prevented the passing an ACT for the Settlement of the Estates of Adventurers and Souldiers there, which I heard you intended to have done in a few dayes; and I presume it will be now quickly done, being so necessary at this time, when the Wants of the Commonwealth call for Supplies; and People will unwillingly pay Taxes for those Estates of which they have no legall Assurance: I need not tell you how much you were abused in the nomination of your Officers of your Armies there, their malice that deceiv'd you, hath been sufficiently manifested; I do affirm, That those now that have declared for you, will continue faithful, and thereby Evince, that as well there as here, it is the sober Interest must establish Dominion. As for Scotland, I must say, The People of that Nation deserve much to be Cherish'd; and I believe your late Declaration will much glad their Spirits; for nothing was to them more dreadfull, than a fear to be o're-run with Phanatique Notions: I humbly recommend them to your Affection and Esteem, and desire the intended Union may be prosecuted, and their Taxes made proportionable to those in England, for which I am Engag'd to promise to become a Suitor to you: And truly, Sir, I must ask leave to intreat you to make a speedy Provision for their Civill Government there, of which they have been destitute near a Year, to the ruine of many Families; And except Commissioners for managing of the Government, and Judges to sit in Courts of Judicature, be speedily appointed, that Countrey will be very miserable.

"I directed Mr. Gumble lately to present some Names to you both for Commissioners and Judges; but by reason of your great Affairs, he was not required to deliver them in Writing, but I humbly present them to your Consideration.

And so concluding, he deliver'd them the Paper wherein the said Names were contain'd.

The City continue inale- content.

The Generall Order'd to march into the City and pull down the Gates.

He obeys their Orders, though unwillingly.

Mr. Jolly's Prudent Speech to the Generall.

The Generall Writes to the House, to mitigate their Commands.

They so much the more Rur'd up, send more rigorous Orders than before.

The Generall Commands the Gates and Percullices to be broken down.

Scott and some others were much offended that he assum'd so much in this Speech, and were once thinking to interrupt him. They complained to their Confidants, That he was too positive in undertaking for the Officers in Ireland, of whose Affections to the Parliament in the present Constitution of it, there was just cause of doubt; and that in the whole Speech he seem'd to affect Popularity, and gave the Cavaliers a possibility of being received into the exercise of Trust, with a total Exclusion of the more strict Parliament-Party, under the Notion of Phanatiques.

But that which at this time more disquieted these men than the Generall's Speech, was the discontented Carriage of the City; for the Common-Council had been in very high Debates about the Government, and were resolv'd to pay no publick Taxes till the House was fill'd up with equal Representatives: This they looked upon as drawing towards a Contempt of their Authority, and thought they could not better provide for their own Securities, than by opposing in time, and punishing such contumacies; they therefore on the 8th of February in the Evening at the Council of State. Order the Generall to go into London the next Morning with a good part of the Army, and to seize upon Eleven of the most active of the Common-Council, and commit them to the Tower, as also to pull down the Posts and Chains, and take down the Gates and Percullices of the City, and Quarter his Souldiers there, till they were reduced to Obedience.

The Generall was surpris'd at this Command, and debated many things with them in mitigation of its execution of it, till near one in the Morning the next day, but nothing could divert their Resolution; so that he was forc'd to obey their Orders, or quit his Command, for he had no longer time to deliberate, than that very Morning in which they were to be put in Execution; insomuch, that after three or four hours of repose to refresh himself, he march'd into the City, and pull'd down the Posts and Chains, and took into Custody Nine of the Citizens which he had Orders to secure, the other two absented themselves: The Nine Imprisoned, were Mr. Lawrence Bromfield of Tower-Street, Alderman Vincent, Mr. Thomas Brown of Woodstreet, Mr. Daniell Spencer in Frydaystreet, Mr. Penning in Fan-Church-Street, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Chamberlain, and Mr. Richard Ford. The City was much Alarm'd at this proceeding; And the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and several of the chiefest of the Citizens applied themselves to him to moderate his Actions. All the City indeed seem'd as People confounded with wonder and Anxiety. And Colonel Hubblethorne and others, the Generall's own Officers were many of them so much troubled, That they came to him to offer up their Commissions, rather than be employed in such an Action: They told him, The honour and respect they had to his Person, engaged them never to serve against him, or dispute his Orders; but in this, since they could not without horror obey them, they with tears pray'd him to dispose of their Commands to some more necessary persons. He was mov'd much at these their passionate expressions, but privately inform'd them of his own dislike of what was Commanded; and therefore Conjur'd them to continue their Confidence in him, and execute what he had given them in Charge, as that from which better effects would ensue, than was convenient at that time to be explain'd. With this they went away somewhat better contented, though not fully satisfied. He took his Quarter at the Three Tunns in Guild-Hall-Yard, where, notwithstanding this accident, he received with much Civility those which came to him: Among whom, one Mr. Jolly, a discreet Citizen, with modesty and temper represented to him the Inconveniences of what he had undertaken, and told him, The Affections of the City to him was such, that what e're he reasonably could desire of them, should be easier obtain'd by Persuasion, than Force. That the Controversie between Enemies had nothing in it extraordinary; but to be ill Treated by Friends, was very grievous. When Hewson march'd into the City with a greater Number, he could not Compass his Ends, but received Opposition with Contumelies and Affronts both to his Person and Party: But when he came, a generall Calm and Kindness was seen in the Countenances of the People: And now that he had put his most rigorous Orders in Execution, they seem'd rather amaz'd with Astonishment to receive it from his hand, than provok'd to resent the Indignity of it.

This Prudent Speech made great impression on him, insomuch that he told them thereupon, That he had Orders to take down the Gates and Percullices as well as the Posts and Chains, but he would immediately write to the Parliament to mitigate their Commands. And accordingly he writ to acquaint them, That he had secur'd all the Persons given him in charge to Imprison, except Two that were absent; And that the next Morning the Lord Mayor and Aldermen had appointed a meeting of the Common-Council, where they doubted not that all things would be compos'd to their Satisfaction, and the Assessments be pay'd, (which was the chiefest cause of his March into London) so that thereupon he had forbore to meddle with the Gates and Percullices, till he should receive further Orders, because such severe acting would highly incense the City, and he hop'd by mild means to reduce them to reason. This Letter made them higher than before; for whereas in their former Orders they had appointed him only to unhinge the Gates, and pull down the Percullices; They now Command him to destroy both Gates and Percullices: And to prevent the meeting of the Common-Council, they Order'd, That the present Common-Council of the City should be dissolv'd; and declared them null and void. And without any other Answer, they sent their Votes to the Generall.

Upon this return, he was not a little perplex'd in Mind, and very thoughtfull what to do; but at last he resolv'd fully to execute his Orders, that the House might not take occasion from his dispute of them, in the unfetled Condition of the Souldiers, to vacate his Commission, and thereupon Commanded his Souldiers to Break all the Gates and Percullices in pieces. Which done, on Fryday in the Evening he came back to White-Hall; but at his return, Scott and Hazle-

A rigg, and some others of their Violent Friends were very much mov'd as if he had disobey'd his Orders, by which they said he was to continue with his Army in the City, till several Designs of theirs for the further humbling them to their purposes should be effected; and there was a Whisper as if he were to have been Question'd for it. It was also artificially contriv'd, that the same day the Gates were pull'd down, a Petition from a Factious Phanatique Party of Citizens was presented by one Praise-God-Barnboe to the House, to Countenance the Action, and to press an Oath of Renunciation to be taken by all that should be employed in Civil and Military Affairs: Nevertheless, to please the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, They had the Thanks of the House for their Moderation, in this time of disorder in the City.

That Evening Clarges privately went to the Generall, and represented to him the ill Consequences of his Proceedings in London; And that the Influence that City had by Commerce and other occasions all over England, would quickly diffuse the Infamy of the Fall: And all the Cities and Towns would be Alarm'd, believing if that Great City should be made a Village, all their Franchises and Priviledges would be quickly Subverted. So that he had no way to redeem his Reputation, but the very next Morning to return into the City with his Army, and declare for a Free Parliament. The Generall though he demur'd a little, upon this Counsel, yet he seem'd very sensible of the Contempt they at Westminster had put upon him in the whole Progress of this Affair, and was resolv'd after a day or two's private Consultation with some of his Officers, to do something to regain the Esteem he had lost; for the performance of which, he said he would take time, but till Tuesday Morning. This was the effect of their first Discourse. But a while after, Dr. Barrow came to Clarges, earnestly urging him to renew his Advice to the Generall, setting forth, *That delay might give his Enemies time to put out of his power the doing what he intended; And that it was most necessary to be speedy in the retrieving the good Opinion of the City, to manifest thereby the greater dislike of what he had done the day before, as that to which the necessity of the time (against his own Inclination) press'd him to. Whilest they were in this Discourse, Two Officers of the Army in whom the Generall then had much Trust, came in to them, and they altogether went to him again, and with the same Arguments reiterated, dissuaded from delay; Adding, That they had certain Intelligence, that the Council of State began to be jealous of him, for that little Favour he shew'd to the City in the execution of his Orders, and that he ought therefore in Prudence to provide for his own Safety. Barrow was appointed to gain what Intelligence he could against the next Morning; And the Generall with Clarges, Thompson, Saunders, and Barton, which two last were adviced with as two Officers that very much inclin'd to Admission of the Secluded Members, Consulted what to offer to the House as a ground for their March into London: At last, waving all thought of making any excuse for marching into the City, they conclude, That Orders should be privately issued for about a dozen of the chief Officers, in whom he had greatest Confidence, to meet at Six the next Morning at the Generall's Quarters, and for the drawing of some men together before White-Hall, to be ready to March; And that a Letter should be sent to the House in the Morning sign'd by the Generall and a Select number of Military Officers, to Complain of many Irregularities committed by them: Amongst others,*

E That they gave too much Countenance to Lambert, Vane, and severall that Engag'd with the late Committee of Safety; And that they had permitted Ludlow and some others to sit in their House; that had been by Sir Charles Coot and some of the Irish Officers accused of High Treason; And had Countenanced too much a late Petition, to exclude the most Sober and Conscientious both Ministers and others by Oaths, from all Employment or Maintenance: And in Conclusion, to Request, That by Fryday next they should Issue out Writs to fill up their House, and when fill'd, should rise at their appointed time, to give place to a Full and a Free Parliament.

*F The Generall having agreed to these Heads, retir'd to his repose, whilest the rest penn'd the Letter, which he directed to be drawn in his Name, and in the name of the rest of the Officers of the Army. The next day the Officers who had been sent for to meet at White-Hall, repairing thither early in the Morning, the Letter was produced and read to them, (the Generall being present) and by all of them approv'd of, whereupon the Generall Signed it, and with him severall Colonels (viz.) Saunders, Read, Lydcote, Knigh, Clobery, Redman, and Hubblethorne. one Lieutenant Colonel, which was Ethelbert Morgan, who Commanded the Generall's own Regiment of Foot, and Six Majors, Johnson, Barton, Smith, Barnister, Prynce, and Nicholls; Clobery and Lydcote were sent with the Letter to the House, and Clarges at the same time was sent to my Lord Mayor, to acquaint him with the Generall's Intentions to come and Quarter his Army that Night in the City; and to dispose of him and the City to give him a favourable reception.*

*G These things thus order'd, the General immediately march'd away to Finsbury, where he drew up his Souldiers, till he should hear from Clarges, how the City would receive him: Who finding my Lord Mayor very reserv'd, and averse to the Generals coming, as terrified with his Actions the day before, had applied himself to Alderman Robinson, and some others that he durst trust, and acquainted them privately, that the Generals coming was for good to the City and Kingdom; but did not instance the Particulars, of what was in agitation, having had Orders to conceal that, till it was known how they at Westminster should receive the Letter; Nevertheless, Robinson sends*

A Petition to the House from the Seclarian Party of the City.

Clarges Counsells the Generall to endeavour the speedy recovery of the City's good Opinion.

Dr. Barrow urges the danger of delay in this business.

The Generall upon advice with some of his Officers, concludes to return immediately.

The Substance of his Letter to the House.

The Letter being sign'd by the Generall and severall Officers, is sent by Clobery and Lydcote.

The Generall having sent Clarges before to my Lord Mayor, marches to Finsbury. Clarges finding my Lord Mayor or dissentfully resolves himself to Alderman Robinson for

for two or three Aldermen of his Confidants, and with these they go to the Lord Mayor to mollify him, but without any effect for the present: Nevertheless, Clarges told him, the General was resolv'd, though he quarter'd not in the City, at least to be his Guest at Dinner: And accordingly, he sent to the General, to desire him to march with all his men to Leaden-Hall street, to the Lord Mayor's Door, which he immediately did. While Matters were thus carry'd on in the City, the House was in great Disorder, at the reading of the General's Letter; but they temporiz'd so far, as to shew no publique Disaffection, but Ordered,

The House dissimble their resentment of the Generals Letter, and give him good words.

That the Thanks of the House should be given to the General for his Faithful Service in securing of the City; and that, as to filling up the House, the Parliament were upon Qualifications, before the Receipt of his Letter, and the same should be dispatch'd in due time; and that Mr. Scot, and Mr. Robinson, should attend him with their Votes, in Answer to his Letter.

The General troubled at the Lord Mayor's Diffidence of him.

As soon as the General came to the Lord Mayor, he told him, He was very welcome to his house but that the City was full of Fears and sad Apprehensions, of his sudden Return, after such violent Aliens as the Day before his Soldiers had been employed in. The General told him, He hoped to make them of another mind in few hours. Yet was he inwardly somewhat troubled, not knowing what hindrance this Coldness he found might give to his Designs; inasmuch, that he call'd Clarges aside, and checkt him, as one who had over-hastily press'd him on, upon so little time of Consideration, to so great an Enterprize. To which, he answer'd, That he was now too far advanc'd to go back; and that the best Advice he could give him, was, to desire the Lord Mayor presently to appoint the Aldermen and Common-Council, to meet him at four a Clock at Guild-Hall, and there to acquaint them with his real Intentions, to comply with the Desires of the whole Kingdom.

Requests the calling of a Common-Council.

This Motion pleasing, and the said Request being accordingly made to the Lord Mayor, Orders were immediately sent out; but in the mean time, Scot and Robinson came to him from them at Westminster, with the before-mention'd Answer to the Letter.

Scot and Robinson sent from the House to the General, with their Answer to his Letter. Bridges & Clowberry sharply upbraids them.

Scot made Protestations of the Parliaments Affection to him, and their high Opinion of his Services, thereby to divert him from his Intentions of staying in the City: But Colonel Bridges, an Officer of Ireland, that stood by, told them, The General had no reason to credit their fair Speeches, since their Words and their Practices agreed not together, as was manifest in their Contempt of those his Friends in Ireland, who for his sake, hazarded themselves in their Service; And when now he came from the Irish Army, to impeach Ludlow and Jones of High-Treason, he could have no Justice, but was put off from Day to Day, when Praise-God Barebone could be heard and admitted with a Seditious Petition, the first moment he came to the Door of the House. And Clowberry told them, The General and all his Officers could not but perceive, that they grew jealous of them, and that they went about to Balance them, with such as had been their Enemies, which made it high-time for them to consult for their own safety.

An Act for constituting Commissioners for the Government of the Army.

The General closed all with Moderation, telling them, All would be well, if they strictly observed the Advice of the Letter, and issued out Writs on Friday next, for filling up their House.

With this Answer they return'd to their Fellow-Members, not very well satisfied, as was evident by what they did that very Afternoon in the House; for they pass'd an Act to divide the Government of the Army among Five Commissioners; namely, General Monck, Sir Arthur Haslerigg, the Colonels, Morley, Walton, and Alured, and made the Quorum of them to be Three.

This was oppos'd by many of the General's Friends, but they were not enough to hinder its Progress: at last, for an Expedient, it was moved, That General Monck should always be one of the Three for Quorum: But upon putting the Question, 'twas carry'd in the Negative. When word was brought him of this their Ingratitude to him, he could not avoid expressing much Indignation at it.

The Lord Mayor and Common-Council, being met at Guild-Hall about Five of the Clock, the General told them,

The General executeth his late Proceeding in the City, before the Common-Council.

That the Employment whercon he was sent, at his last being in the City, was the most ingrateful to him that ever he undertook, and so much against his Inclination, that if any thing less than quitting his Command, could have prevented it, he had never accepted such Employment; nor did he value his Commission, out of any respect to himself, for he had often desired to lay it down; but as knowing how much it import'd both him and them, to keep it out of the Hands of such as most probably would not be so well inclin'd as He, to the Settlement of these Nations; That what he had now to tell them, was, That he had that Morning sent to the Parliament, to issue out Writs within seven dayes, for the filling up of their House; and when fill'd, to sit no longer, than till the Sixth of May, to give then Place to a full and a Free Parliament.

The City joyfully receives the News of a Free Parl.

The News of this was quickly dispers'd through all the City, and received with great Demonstrations of Joy, expressed in Bon-fires, and Ringing of Bells.

After

A After this, he retir'd for some time to the Bull in Chappside, to give Order for the Quartering of his Soldiers, and went himself to Lodge at the Glass-house in Broad Street, till Drapers Hall could be accommodated for his Reception.

The Monday after his stay in the City, the Council of State writ to him, To desire his presence with them, to assist with his Counsels, in the carrying on the great Affairs of the Nation.

To which he the next Day return'd Answer,

That till the Oath should be taken away, which put a barre to him and many others, from acting as Counsellors, his presence could not be useful to them there: And withall, he inform'd them, That the Distractions of the City were insur'd, by the continuance of Arms in the Hands of Phanatiques, and Persons Disaffected to the Parliament, who had 7000 lately out of the Stores deliver'd to them, and were providing more: Wherefore he desired them immediately to recall these Arms; and withall, to excuse his stay in the City for some longer time, till the Minds of the Citizens were compos'd.

The General's Answer to the Council of State, inviting him to come and sit with them.

The Mayor and Aldermen of the City, and the Chief of the Officers (hearing how earnest the Parliament was, to draw him again to White-Hall) importun'd his Continuance in the City, and to induce him to it; they assure him, it cannot be safe for him, or them, that he remove; for that they had certain Information, That many private Letters were sent from Haslerigg, and others, to withdraw the Affections of the Souldiery from him, and that certain men were employed to severall Regiments, to debauch them: This Information had been enough to induce the General, had he not been resolv'd before: So that when Colonel Alured came from the Council of State, to persuade him against staying in the City, he acquainted him with what he had heard. Alured labor'd to insuffle a Belief in him, of his having been mis-inform'd in those things. It was answer'd by the General, That he put no greater stress on those Reports, than to be vigilant over the Aliens and Motions of the several Parties, deferring the belief of them, till time should evince the truth. But he assur'd him, He was advis'd from Persons of good Fame, That notwithstanding that Lambert was resolv'd, and Vane put out of the Parliament, and order'd to leave the Town; yet the stay of the latter was resolv'd at, and Sir Arthur Haslerigg, and several others, corresponded with them both.

The City, and chief Officers of his Army, dissuade him from hearkning to the Parliaments Invitations, to return back to Whitehall. Col. Alured solicits his return in vain.

D Sir Arthur Haslerigg writ many Expostulatory Letters, to free himself of these Imputations, but could not sufficiently clear himself of them. And now by more frequent Addresses than ever, the General is from all Counties solicited, to the admission of the Secluded Members, which he only delayed, because the Army was not yet in a Temper for it; but to prepare them, he received Visits from some of the Secluded Members, where they were always admitted, to hear by their Discourses, how well they were inclined to the Settlement of the Peace of the Nations. In this Method, he so far proceeded, as on the 18th of February, to have a Conference before him, of some of the Secluded Members, and some of the others. Those of the Sitting Members, were, Sir John Haslerigg, Morley, Thompson, Ashley-Cooper, Weaver, White, Feilder, Hutchinson, and Rawleigh; Scot and Reynolds also were intended by the General to be there, but for want of timely Notice they came not. The Secluded Members that met them, were, Sir William Lewis, Sir John Evelyn, Sir John Holland, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Colonel Popham, Mr. Annesley, Mr. Knightly, Mr. Crew, Mr. Trevor, Colonel Harley, Colonel Norton, Sir John Temple, and Colonel Birch. They discours'd of many things, in order to a mutual Accord, for the Peace and Welfare of the Nations, but came to no Conclusion; because the Sitting Members durst not undertake for the rest of the House, without their Consent, which could not be known but by Vote: Yet severally all of them who were then present, seem'd well satisfied with that Moderation and Temper, which they found in those Gentlemen with whom they conferr'd.

The General is importun'd from all Parties, to admit the Secluded Members.

He admits of a Conference before him, of the Sitting Members, with some of the Secluded.

The General was fully bent to promote their Admission so far, that if it could not be done by Common Consent, he Resolv'd to admit them without it.

F The Officers of the Army were consult'd with, and they were willing enough to have them sit, on condition they would promise to Declare for a Common-Wealth Government, and pass an Act, for the Confirmation of the Possessions of their Lands, dispos'd of since their Seclusion, and to agree upon a short time for their Dissolution. Wherefore, to try how far they were inclin'd, to admit of those Conditions, Mr. Clarges, Colonel Clowberry, and Doctor Gumble, were appointed to Treat with some of them, who when they met, had many Discourses of the whole Matter;

The Officers of the Army consent to the admission of the Secluded, upon certain Conditions. Mr. Clarges, and others, appointed to Treat with some of the Secluded, concerning the said Conditions.

The Secluded Members Declared, as to Government, they intended no alteration in it, or to all further, than in preparation for a Parliament to succeed them; and since there was no other way for their Summon, but by writs, in the Name of the Keepers of the Liberty of England, by Authority of Parliament, they saw not how there could be by that Constitution any other Government introduced: As to Confirmation of Sales, and Dispositions of Lands, they said, they had been all made since the Seclusion, and they would not alter them, but rather mediate with the next Parliament, to pass an Act for their Confirmation; and for the time of their Sitting, They were contented it should determine in a Month's time. Clowberry urg'd the great Insecurity the Army and many of their

Friends would be in, if their Publique Lands were not confirm'd, which was the Price of their Blood; and though their not disturbing such Possessions in England, might be a little Satisfaction, yet the whole Nation of Ireland was unsettled, both as to Adventurers and Souldiers. To this it was Replyed, That they should not think themselves in a Capacity to pass any Acts at all, as being but one House; and to prevent all Jealousie of their Actions, they would consent to be Limited to the Chief Heads of what they should Consult, during the short time of their Continuance.

The Consultations upon what the Members had deliver'd of their Intention.

When the Conference ended, Report was made of the Substance of it to the General, and the rest of the Chief Officers, who approved of every thing proposed by the Secluded Members, except the not Confirmation of Publique Dispositions of Lands; and their refusing to pass any Acts of Parliament: As to that of Lands, which they would not be drawn to confirm, Charles told the Officers, they had less need to trouble themselves about that, in regard he thought those Persons could not answer it to the Kingdom, to break with them for that Consideration, thereby to obstruct the Settlement of it, out of respect to their own private Interests; That the greatest part of his own Estate was in Ireland, and that it was acknowledg'd by all, the greatest Insecurity of Publique Estates was in that Kingdom: yet he would for his own part submit all his Concerns to the Determination of the next Parliament; rather than by opposing the Admission of these Gentlemen, contribute to the hazard of the Publique Peace. And as to that of Publique Acts, he told them, He doubted not, but they would alter their Opinions, because no Money could be raised, to supply the Necessities of the Government; nor could their own Dissolution be, but by an Act.

The General & the Officers agree, upon admitting the Secluded Members.

The General, upon hearing this, seem'd very much satisfied; upon which, all the rest assented. And it was agreed, That the Secluded Members that were in Town, should, before their Admission, sign a Paper, to consent to confine their Consultations, chiefly to the Four Heads following.

The Chief Heads recommended to their Consultations.

1. To the settling the Conduct of the Armies, in the Three Nations, as might be most serviceable to the Peace of the Nations.
2. For the providing Maintenance for the Forces by Sea and Land, and Money for their Arrears, and the Contingencies of Government.
3. To the appointing a Councill of State to settle the Civill Government and Judicatures in Scotland and Ireland, and to take care for the Issuing of Writs for the Summoning of a Parliament to meet at Westminster the 20th of April.
4. To their own Legall Dissolution.

The General meets them at White-Hall, in order to their Admission into the House.

This Subscription was willingly made, and on Tuesday following in the Morning, the General gave them a meeting at White-Hall; Whence, after a short Speech to recommend to them the Settlement of the Nations, with assurance, That he would impose nothing on them, they went to take their Places in the Parliament; being Conducted thither by Captain Miller who Commanded the Guards.

As soon as the Members were gone, the General Summon'd all the Officers of the Army together that were then in and about London, to consider of a Letter to be sent to all the Regiments in England, Scotland, and Ireland, to have their Concurrence to what had been done concerning the Admission of the Secluded Members; which was referred to a Committee to be drawn up, with speciall Directions to satisfy them, That nothing was intended for alteration of Government, but that it should continue as a Free State and Commonwealth: This he did, in regard he knew it impossible, as affairs stood, to keep the Army in temper any other way. The Letter was in a little time prepar'd, and so many Clerks were employed, That Copies of it were that Night Signed and dispersed to all the Regiments and Garrisons in England, and to the Commanders in Chief of the Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland. It was penn'd in these Words:

Dear Brethren and Fellow Souldiers;

The General's Letter to all the Regiments, to acquaint them with what he had done.

You cannot be Ignorant of the many Endeavours and earnest Desires of many good Men in these Nations to bring us to a Settlement; which it hath pleased God to disappoint unto this Day, and leave us as a broken and divided People, ready to run into Blood and Confusion: Which that we might prevent so great Calamities impending, after our earnest seeking God for his Direction and Assistance, we find no expedient so likely for the satisfaction of the Good People, and the Quiet and welfare of this Commonwealth, as the re-admission of the Secluded Members, in order to a Legall Dissolution of this Parliament by their own free Consent, and to Issue Writs for a future full Representative of the whole Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, under such Qualifications as may secure our Cause, to convene on the Twentieth day of April next at Westminster, for the establishing of this Commonwealth upon the Foundations ons of Justice and true Freedom. And to take away all just Jealousies from you, we do assure you, That we shall joyn with you in the maintenance of those Ends, and do expect your Chearfull Concurrence with us; having no intentions or purposes, to return to our old Bondage; but since the Providence of God hath made us free at the cost of so much Blood, we hope we shall never be found so unfaithfull to God and his People, as to lose so glorious a Cause; but we do resolve with the Assistance of God, to adhere to you in the continuing of our dear purchased Liberties, both Spirituall and Civill. The reason of Our proceeding in this manner may seem strange, but if you duly consider the necessities of our Affairs, and the present state of things, you will certainly conclude nothing so safe to secure Publique Interest, and to engage the Nations peaceably to submit to a Free State; most of the said Members having given in full assurance, that their Session in Parliament shall not be longer than absolute necessity will require, to the putting the Government into Successive Parliaments, they not being free so to Act by the old Writs, as when they shall be called upon a Commonwealth accompt: And it's the Opinion of the truest Friends to a Free State, That it cannot be consistent with the perpetuall Sitting of these Members, being contrary to the nature of such a Government.

And as we are confident the present Parliament now Sitting, will not Repeal any of the Acts, Ordinances, or Orders of this present Parliament, for Sales, or publique dispositions of Lands; so we shall in our station observe, and cause to be observed, all other Acts and Ordinances of this Parliament whatsoever, and humbly interpose with the next succeeding Parliament, not only to passe a further ACT of Confirmation of all such Sales and Dispositions of Lands, here and in Scotland, but also of the distributions and dispositions of Lands and Houses in Ireland to the Souldiers, Adventurers, or any other Persons, made by or in pursuance of any of the Acts, Ordinances, or Orders of this present Parliament, or any pretended Parliamentary Authority. And we intreat you to send up an Officer to give to the Lord General Monck an accompt of your Acquiescence with us herein.

And if any disaffected persons shall take occasion to make disturbance of the Peace of the Commonwealth, either in favour of Charles Stuart, or any other pretended Authority, we desire you to secure them, till the pleasure of the Parliament or Councill of State be known in that behalf. You shall speedily receive Encouragement and Supplies of Money; and indeed it was not the least Motive to induce us to this way of composition of Affairs, that we might facilitate the raising of Monies for the Subsistence of the Army and Navy; which would not otherwise have been done (if at all) but with effusion of Blood. We have nothing more at this time, but to assure you that we shall ever remain

Upon the Admission of the Secluded Members, divers of the rest quit the House.

These Transactions were managed with so much Secrecie, that the Members that were sitting in the House knew nothing of them, till they saw the Secluded Members come in and sit amongst them. Upon which they being surpris'd, were at first at a demur amongst themselves, whether they should keep their Seats, or quit the House; till at length, the grand Sticklers of them for a Commonwealth, well knowing that it would not be in their power by staying, to make their Interest good against those who were now the major Party of the House, resolv'd since they could not hinder them the partiall possession thereof, to resign it into unto them, while those of them that were the most moderate and well inclined stay'd behind, and took their Seats amongst the new admitted Members: Who in the first place applied themselves to Vindicate the honour of their House as far as in them lay, by nullifying and expunging out of the Journals all Votes whereby they were disabled from sitting as Members therein; Next, they Order Mr. Vincent and Mr. Bromfield, and the rest of those Citizens which were committed by the Council of State Orders when the City Gates were broken, to be released; as also all others who were any where Imprisoned upon Sir George Booth's Risings, or for making Addresses for the Admission of the Secluded Members: Moreover, they Constituted Generall Monk by ACT of Parliament, Captain Generall of all the Armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and repeal'd that ACT which made him only a Joynt-Commissioner with Colonel Morley, Haslerigg, Walton, and Alured, for Government of the Army.

Some there were of these restored Members, who at the first admission, could not well be present, by reason of their far distant Habitations; of which number was Mr. William Morrice, whom Mr. Nicholas Monk, the Generall's Brother, knowing him to be a Prudent Person, and well disposed for his Prince's Service, and the good of his Country, writ to Charles to put the Generall in mind of sending for him, that being near him; he might be assistant to him in his Counsells: To this the Generall was easily perswaded, having had long before by his Brothers report of him, a good Opinion of his Abilities and Worth; and the rather, for that by his Wife he was somewhat allied to him. Charles acquainted Mr. Nicholas Monk with what he had done, and inclosed a Letter from the Generall to Mr. Morrice, to acquaint him with his admission of the Secluded Members, and to desire him to repair to the Parliament: Where he arrived whilest they were sitting, and took his place in the House; wherein he appeared a most usefull Instrument by his great Abilities, in Promoting and carrying on of the Generall's Affairs in relation to his Majesties Interest.

The Parliament repeald the ACT for the former Council of State, and the Oath of Abjuration; and pass'd an ACT for another Council to consist of One and thirty Persons: Which were;

Generall George Monck,
William Pierpoint,
John Crew, Esquire,
Colonel Rositer,
Richard Knightly, Esquire,
Colonel Popham,
Colonel Morley,
Lord Fairfax,
Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper,
Sir Gilbert Gerrard,
Lord St. John,
Sir John Temple,
Lord Commissioner Widdrington,
Sir John Evelyn of Wills,
Sir William Waller,
Sir Richard Onslow,

Sir William Lewis,
Colonel Edward Mountague,
Col. Edward Harley,
Col. Richard Norton,
Arthur Ansley, Esquire, Dezill Hollis Esq;
Colonel George Thompson,
John Trevor, Esquire,
Sir John Holland,
Sir John Potts,
Colonel John Birch,
Sir Harbottle Grimstone,
John Swinsin, Esq;
John Weaver, Esq;
Serjeant Maynard.

Most of them Men of Integrity, and well affected to Kingly Government.

The Generall hearing that Colonel Rich was about St. Edmunds Bury, and having actually debauch'd Two Troops, was endeavouring to Corrupt the rest of his Regiment, he sent the Life-Guard to reduce them, and gave a Commission to Colonel Ingoldesby to Command the Regiment.

The Life-Guard had been lately in defection with the rest of the Troops under Lambert, and had not been mustered since the Restauration of the Parliament, nor had hitherto any Commander in Chief. And therefore the Generall thought fit at this time to modell that Troop, and to give the Command thereof to Captain Philip Howard, making Mr. Robert Harley his Lieutenant, and his Kinsman Mr. Henry Monk, Cornet, who were so active, that in Six hours time they displac'd all of whom they had any suspicion, and fill'd up the Troop with honest and gallant Men; who immediately march'd towards Suffolk, to execute the Generall's Orders upon Colonel Rich; but he having notice of the marching of that Party towards him, retir'd privately, and the Regiment quietly received Colonel Ingoldesby to Command them, who by the Generall's appointment

The Life-guard modell'd, and conferr'd upon Captain Philip Howard.

Rich his Regiment submit to the Generall's Orders.

A pointment put out all such Officers as were of froward and Seditious Principles in Religion or Government.

And to reduce North-Wales to a more settled Condition, than it was in at that present, the Generall gave Colonel Carter a Commission to be Governour of Beaumaris Castle, (the Souldiers whereof had been plac'd there by Colonel John Jones) with authority to raise Forces to reduce Denbigh and Conway, which had been in very ill hands, and to settle that Country in Quiet: where he did in a very short time, to the great satisfaction of all the Gentry and People in those Parts.

The late Commonwealth-Parliament before the admission of the Secluded Members, had given Desbrow's Regiment to Colonel Walton; but the Generall dispos'd of it to Colonel Charles Howard of Namorth, whom he also made Governour of Carlisle.

The Parliament pass'd an Act of Assesment for a Hundred Thousand Pounds a Moneth for Six Moneths, and proceeded with much haste to settle the Militia both in the City and all other Parts of England and Wales, having vacated the former ACT made before their admission, because most of the Commissioners and Officers all over England, were of Persons of suspected Inclinations to the Government.

There being at this time an unusual Confluence of Officers of the Army in London, and some Troops and Companies drawing together in severall Parts of the Kingdome; The Parliament by Proclamation Commanded all Officers to repair to their respective Charges, and nor to depart from thence without special Order from the Lord Generall: And that all such Troops and Companies as had removed from their Quarters without the Lord Generall's Licence, should return forthwith to their last Quarters formerly Assigned, or to such others as should be assigned them by directions from the Lord Generall.

But notwithstanding all this Care in the Parliament, Colonel Overton was designing to make Disturbances in Yorkshyre: He drew up a Letter to Colonel Fairfax, Colonel Bethell, and Colonel Smithson, which he caus'd to be Subscrib'd by all his Officers; And therein signified to them;

That having received intimation from private hands, That the abandoned Interest of Charles Stuart doth seem so to shine in the face of Publique Transactions, that many Jealousies and dissatisfactions were created amongst their Brethren in the Army, who remained faithfull to the true Cause they had contended for, inasmuch, that (as it was represented to them) severall Regiments had declared their disconcurrence with these present Distractions, and their Resolutions in adhering to the Cause God had determined with Victory against all Monarchicall Interests, they could not but judge it incumbent upon them to wake in such a time, and to endeavour to be found in the discharge of that Duty which their Intrustments Commanded from them; wherein as on the one hand they were unwilling to appear precipitate in their proceedings, so on the other they were afraid to fall short of a timely interposing of their Assistance against that old Bondage which was likely to break in anew upon them: And therefore they thought fit to expedite that Intimation unto them, and desire to understand as well what was their sence, as what was signified or imparted to them: That as they were equally engaged and concerned in one Publique Cause, so they might (if occasion required) be as conjunctively abetting and assisting to the defence of it, which through the Assistance of God they were resolv'd to assert and maintain (as the fruits of their Blood, the Nations Treasure, and the Prayers of the People of God) against any Design whatsoever which threatned the ruine of their Civill and Religious Rights.

Many Copies of this Letter were dispers'd amongst the Souldiers before the Original was sent, and an Attestation added in these words, This is Overton's and the Officers of the Garrison of Hulls Letter: And it is hoped, will meet with the ready Concurrence of all honest Fellow-Souldiers who have been engaged in the Good Old Cause against the Interest of a King and Single Person.

If Colonel Fairfax, Smithson, and Bethell, had not been very Active, this practice had perverted many Souldiers; but they were vigilant to prevent it. Upon knowledge of this Letter, The Generall Writ to Overton by Colonel Alured and Major Smith, to give him Satisfaction in his proceedings here; and the Council of State upon his Motion did the like. Major Smith was well known and belov'd in Hull, and the Generall having a Design to Remove Overton, he was privately to deal with some Officers and Souldiers under him who lov'd him not, to bring him to Reason, if upon Orders for his Remove, he should be disobedient to them; And as soon as they were gone, he sent private Orders to Colonel Fairfax, to whom he gave a Commission to be Governour of Hull, to draw some Companies to Beverly, and Writ to Overton to repair immediately to him, his Letter was sent to Colonel Fairfax open, that he might see the Import of it. The Letter was in the following Words:

The Generall takes care for the settling of North-Wales.

The Parliament levy a new Tax, and proceed to the settlement of the Militia.

They Command all Officers and Souldiers to repair to their several Commands and Quarters.

A Letter of Col. Overton and the Officers with him, to some of the Generall's Officers.

The Generall's
Letter to Colonel Overton.

I Have seen a Letter from you and some others at Hull, dated from that Garrison on the 28th of February last, and directed to Colonel Fairfax, Colonel Bethell, and Colonel Smithson, wherein you Complain of the present Transactions of the Publique Affairs, as if they tended to the bringing in of the King and a Monarchicall Bondage, which (you write) seems very likely to break in anew upon us, and threatens the ruine of our Civill and Religious Rights: All which, you say, is derived to you from private hands, which do not only insinuate their private Jealousies, but inform you that severall Regiments have declared their disconcurrence with present Transactions. I must confess, I am a little Surpriz'd at this your Letter and manner of proceedings, having so lately sent to you from my self, and the greatest part of the Officers of the Army, a full account of the Necessities that induced us, to consent to the returne of the Secluded Members to the exercise of their Trust; and our Resolutions to that Cause we have so long contended for, and to the Parliament in the prosecution of it: And (notwithstanding the Information you pretend to have receiv'd) I cannot in my own observation discern any Grounds for such apprehensions of Affairs here as you seem to entertain; nor has there appeared a discontent in any one Regiment of the Army, except part of Colonel Rich's Regiment which is since reduced; wherefore (although you pretend not to be too precipitate in your proceedings) your dispersing Copies of your Letter before you sent it, may reasonably make me judge otherwise: And if you prosecute the matter further, I cannot but interpret your Action as tending to divide the Army, by withdrawing their Obedience from the Parliament, and consequently to involve the Nations in a new and bloody warre. So that to avoid all occasions of this nature, I desire that within 24. hours after this Letter comes to your hands, you set forward from Hull towards London, to give me an account of the present posture of that Garrison; And that within Six hours after this comes to you, you signify to Colonel Fairfax and Colonel Bethell, your Compliance herein, and the Day wherein you intend to begin your Journey and be with me here, where I shall expect you within a Week after your departure from Hull. I have written to Colonel Fairfax more particularly concerning the Peace and Safety of the Northern Parts, and of the Garrison of Hull; and if he Communicates any Orders from me to you, I expect your obedience to them.

Yours,
G. Monck.

The Colloanel submits to the Generall's Orders.

Colloanel Overton was surpriz'd at the receipt of this Letter, but finding himself in no Capacity to dispute the Order for his delivery up of Hull, he submitted to it; And sent to Colonel Fairfax to acquaint him with that his Resolution; And himself at Eleven of the Clock the same Night, began his Journey towards London to the Generall.

The Generall about the same time gave his Commission to Mr. Clarges to be Commissary Generall of the Musters of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and to Mr. Morrice to be Governour of Plymouth; and to Major Generall Morgan to be Commander in Chief of the Army in Scotland.

The Army in Scotland well satisfied with the Generall's
Actions.

Morgan was already upon the place, but wanted sufficient authority, till he had this Commission sent to him, and all the Army there submitted to the Generall's Actions in reference to the Secluded Members, except a Company in Garrison in the Isle of Orkney Commanded by one Watson, which was reduc'd by Captain Man, and Watson and his Officers imprisoned, and his Company disbanded.

Many private Overtures were made to the Generall by some of the Lords that sat in the Lords House a little before the death of the late King, to be admitted to Sit; but he thought it inconvenient and hazardous, in regard the Army was already so Jealous upon the Sitting of the Secluded Members, that he had difficulty enough to moderate them. Yet at the Request of the Earl of he sent Commissary Generall Clarges to Confer with him.

A Conference between Commissary Clarges and a Peer of the Land, about the Sitting of the Lords House.

The Earl told him, The Sitting of the Lords would be very advantageous to the good of the Kingdom, and to the Soldiers in particular; for that they would Joyn in an ACT for the Confirmation of their Estates: And if it should be thought convenient for the good of the Kingdom to receive the King, he could not upon any Conditions wish so much Safety be restored, as such as should be made by Act of Parliament.

To this Clarges Replied, That the Generall was very well satisfied, that the Parliament was Dissolv'd by the Death of the late King; and that the present Sitting of the Members, was a Constitution rather taken up upon Necessity, than Right, which was but

A to make way for another Parliament; That one great Argument for the Admission of the Secluded Members, was their Consent to a quick Dissolution; which could not be, if the Lords should Sit: For they would then think themselves invested in that perpetuity which some fancy is of right in this Parliament still. But that which was most convincing, was, That the Army was not yet in temper for it.

Every Post brought the Generall Addresses from all the Regiments in England, of their Consent to his Actions: And Sir Charles Coote in Ireland had with many other Officers upon the same day that the Secluded Members were admitted, declared at Dublin for them, and had secured Sir Hardres Waller, that had dissented from him.

B Those of the former Members who stay'd in the House after the admission of the Secluded, that they might engage against the King, promoted an ACT for the settling of Hampton-Court, with all the Parks and some other Lands upon him and his Heirs for ever; which so troubled him, that he used all the friends he had to divert it; and at last an Expedient was found out, by giving him by Act of Parliament, a Present of Twenty Thousand Pounds in Money, and the Custody or Stewardship of that House, and the Parks for his life; They also Confer'd upon Commissary Clarges the Hamper-Office: And about the 13th of March they Ordered, That the Engagement appointed to be taken by each Member of Parliament, in these words, (viz.) I do declare and promise, That I will be true and faithfull to the Commonwealth of England, as the same is now established without King or House of Lords, should be taken off the File and made null.

C Scott, Hazlerigg, and some others, (whose names we shall forbear to mention, because they are yet living, and have repented of the rashness of their former proceedings) were much Alarm'd at this proceeding, which they took to be an inevitable Prognostique of introducing the King; and though they so much affected Power, as to endure no Rivals in it, they chose rather to have the Generall take the Dominion of the Three Kingdoms upon himself, than to have the King restored: They consulted privately with some of the Officers of the Army, whom they trusted most, and these approv'd so well of the Expedient, That the Generall was Treated with about it in White-Hall; Where Hazlerigg told him, That many of his Friends were much troubled at the Parliaments Actions, which tended both to the ruine of him and all the good People of the Nation, since it was evident that by what they had Voted the day before, nothing was intended but the restitution of the King. His overthrow, they said, must needs succeed the admission of the King; for a Merit too great to be Reward'd, could have no recompense but death; whereof frequent Examples are to be found in all History, and in none more pregnant than our own, where it is Recorded, That the same Stanley who plac'd the Crown upon Henry the Seventh's Head, had his own Head struck off, upon a very frivolous pretence, when the reason was only excess of Merit. They told him likewise, They found a Commonwealth Government not agreeable with the disposition of the People, who are always bad Judges of what is best for themselves, and therefore since a Single Person was necessary, there could not be one fitter than he for that Office. To which, they had very good grounds to believe all the good People of the Nation would concur with them.

E The Generall told them, He himself was not well pleas'd at the late unnecessary Vote of Parliament concerning the Engagement; but many of the most discreet Members had been with him, and satisfied him, That they had no design in it, but to keep themselves free against the next Parliament; for in regard (they said) that he had consented that the final determination of Government should be refer'd to them, they were unwilling to anticipate their Councils by determining of it by that Engagement; which would be too great a Snare unto them: Still urging, That they knew not any cause he should have of fear, for that the very writ of Summons of the next Parliament, did sufficiently defend the Government, in restraining their Debates to it. As for the Government in his own Person, he said, The experience of Cromwell's Fate gave him Reasons to avoid the Rock on which that Family was split.

F They Replied, That Oliver Cromwell usurp'd the Dominion against the Suffrage of the Army, and the Consent of all the good People; whereas he should have it by their unanimous consent, and under what Name and Title he pleas'd to accept it.

The Generall would by no means hear more of these Temptations, resolving not to lose the Honour deriv'd to him from as Ancient a Stock of Gentry as any was in England, by so treacherous a Prostitution of it.

A little before these Men went to the Generall, Commissary Clarges had been tampered with by them, to the same purpose; and observing them to go from him to his Lordship, he deliberated how to extricate him from further applications of this kind, and punish the Insolency of these undertakers.

G The Council of State Sitting at the time of this private Conference, and within two Chambers of the place where it was Transacted, he sent in to the Council to Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper, and inform'd him both of what he knew, and what he further suspected: Upon which it was agreed, That as soon as the Generall should depart from them, and come into the Council, the Commissary being call'd in, should move, That all Clerks and Attendants, that were not Councillors, should withdraw, and the Doors be lock'd, and then declare, That he had had Information of a dangerous Design in some seditious persons who were contriving to make Disturbances in the the Nation, and that they had proceeded so far as to make some indecent Overtures to him, of which he desired that the Council might receive a full discovery, that thereupon they might apply themselves to prevent the Consequences of it.

But the Generall being unwilling to expose those men to ruine, (though they deserved not his favour) because his Purposes were designed to be effected by the most peaceable wayes, told the Council, That there was not so much Danger in agitation as they apprehended; but that it was true, some had been with him to be resolv'd in scruples concerning the present Transactions in Parliament, but they went away from him well satisfied.

Thus the goodness of the Generall was abus'd; for these unreasonable men, when they saw they could not allure him to their ends by the temptation of Power, attempted to make a Mutiny in the Army; wherein they prevail'd so far, as that the Officers had had one Meeting, and had appointed another. In their first, they were so heated, that a Declaration was immediately prepar'd, and brought by some of them to the Generall, to oblige him with his Army to declare for a Commonwealth, and engage against all them that should attempt the setting up of a Single Person; And that he should send to the Parliament to joyn with them in this Declaration.

Commissary Clarges and Mr. Clark, the Generall's Secretary were with him when this was brought to him; and observing great trouble in his Countenance at the reading of it, moved, That he would defer the signing or giving any opinion of it till the next morning, because then the Officers of the Army were to have a Generall Council. This was done, that the Generall might have time to provide himself of Arguments against it, and prepare some of his Friends to joyn with him: One of the chief Motives that induced him to make Mr. Morrice an Officer of the Army, was to have his aid in Consultations at such times as these: for there were frequent Meetings of Officers; and one of so good Judgment and Eloquence as he, could not but persuade much: so that he had been the fittest Person that could have been thought on, had not his being unused to such Assemblies, made him not care to be present at them.

The next morning a great Concourse of Officers met at St. James's; And Colonel Okey open'd the Council, with a long Speech, of the fears they were in of an Inundation of Evils breaking in upon them, to invade their Civil, and Religious Liberties; and that if great Care was not used to prevent it, Charles Stuart would be introduced: And that the best Expedient that could be thought of, was to send immediately to the Parliament, to oblige them to declare and engage for a Free-State and Common-wealth, without a King or House of Lords: And if they refused to do it, to take such a Remedy as God should put into their hearts to save the Nation from destruction.

Commissary Clarges Answered, That he saw no Cause for those fears that were insinuated; and that if they sent to the Parliament in such a manner, they would find no pleasing return from them; for if these Men would have been terrified by the Army, there would not have been 14 of them impeach'd at one time of Treason, and Two hundred Secluded at another; and the first thing they would probably do, upon the receipt of such a Message, would be to Dissolve themselves, and then there would be no Government; but instead of the Single Person they were so much afraid of; they must necessarily have recourse to Richard Cromwell, and expose themselves to his Revenge, for the Indignities they had lately with so much scorn put upon him and his Family.

And then (applying himself to the Generall) he said, The only help was for his Excellency to assume the Government: When as he knew well enough how averse he was thereto, having often heard him say, He would rather be drawn in pieces with Wild Horses, than be so treacherous to the Nation.

The Generall concluded, and told them, The time of this Parliaments ending was so near, they could not do the ill some of them (he hop'd) causelessly fear'd; And that from the next Parliament he doubted not they would receive better satisfaction than they had in this, since it was provided in the ACT for their Assembling, That none should be Elected that had been against the Parliament since 1641. Withall, he confirmed what Commissary Clarges had said, That if by this violent proceeding they should make the Parliament hastily Dissolve themselves, and leave the Nation in Confusion, They must not expect he would take upon him the Government, which he had rather lose his life, than accept.

After this, there was little mov'd by any of the Officers; Only one said, That little could be hoped from Qualifications for a new Parliament; for they themselves being to be Judges of them, might so happen, that the major part might be of such as were not themselves Qualified.

The Generall knew this to be an unanswerable Argument, (and it was for this reason, he press'd for a new Parliament on any terms,) but was unwilling to hear more discourse of this kind, and therefore told them, Nothing was more injurious to Discipline, than their meeting in Military Councils to interpose in Civil things. And from that time he forbade them to assemble again; and within a few dayes after, that is to say, On the Seventeenth of March, the Parliament by

A Act dissolv'd it self, having before summon'd a Parliament to succeed them the 25th day of April following.

Monsieur de Bourdeaux the French Ambassador then Resident in London, was very desirous to interesse Cardinal Mazarini, in this great Revolution of Government, and having had acquaintance with Clarges, expected by him to discover all the Generalls Designs; and in order thereunto, sent his Secretary to him, To desire him to move the Generall, to have Licence to give him a visit, and to confer about some overtures he had to make to him.

Clarges, upon this intimation, went to the Ambassador, who carried him into his Closet, and they two being alone, he told him; That it was visible to all, that the Generall had some great Design in projection, and that most wise men believ'd it was, either to advance himself to the Monarchy of these Nations, or introduce the King; and that in either of these, he had the advantage of being more serviceable to him than any other; for if he should use any Englishman in so important an Intrigue, if he should not have success, that would be brought in evidence against him to his destruction: Whereas if he as a stranger, and a publique Minister could not be questioned. He further said, What he propos'd, was not only in reference to himself, but to Cardinal Mazarini, who would be glad to have the honour of his friendship, and assist him faithfully in all his purposes. He said moreover, That he would not undertake to determine, Whether it was not best for him to dignifie his Family with the Empire of these Kingdoms, or to restore the King to them: They were both actions of much glory; and if the latter were as easie, the honour of it would be as great: But that he might be confident of the Cardinal, he did assure him, that Oliver Cromwell kept so strict a League with him, that he did not assume the Government without his privacy, and was directed step by step by him in the progress of that action: And therefore, if he resolv'd on that course, he should not only have the Cardinals friendship and Counsel in the attempt, but a safe retreat and honourable support in France, if he failed in it. Or if he would admit the King, and put the manner of it into the Cardinals hands, whatever he would desire for himself of Security, or honour from the Crown, he would undertake to obtain, and in such a manner, that it should rather seem by the Cardinals advice, than his particular Inclination; and the King would gladly receive it, and France should be the place to which (if he agreed) the King should presently retreat; where he should have a Train provided proportionable to his greatness, that his People here might, with greater Reverence, apply themselves to him; and by this way (he said) the Generall might not only oblige the King of England, but the King his Master also, by making him a Mediator and Instrument in his Restoration.

To this Clarges answered, That the matter was too deep for him to be involv'd in; in regard (as he himself had acknowledged) of the danger of having such a secret known to any second Person a Native of England.

But nevertheless, to satisfy him, he assured him, That the Generall did not intend to take upon him the Government, but submit all to the determination of the next Parliament.

He then replyed, That a Parliament in England was a kind of tumultuary Council; so various in their Debates, that no certain measure could be taken from them, and that therefore for not taking this course which he advis'd, he might be hurried by their forward proceedings, to some sudden Enterprize, neither safe for himself, nor good for the people; and that with him, in any misfortune, all his Relations would be ruin'd.

To this Conference, Clarges put an end, by telling him, He would take a sudden occasion to sound the Generalls Inclinations; and though he would not directly tell him what had pass'd betwixt them; he should nevertheless guess, whether it might be fit for him to impart it to him; the onely difficulty that remain'd, was the Generalls want of the French Tongue; Which the Ambassador said, was not necessary, for that he had English enough to be understood, and to understand all that should be said to him; and thus they parted.

Clarges told all that pass'd to Mr. Morrice, and to the Generall himself, who absolutely refus'd to have any Commerce with the Ambassador or the Cardinal; nevertheless, that he might not appear uncivil, he was contented to receive his Visit, but on Condition, That he should not propose any thing to him in reference to the publick affairs of Government.

This was signified to the Ambassador, and he came that Evening to complement the Generall, making great professions of his Services to him, on all occasions, without descending to particulars.

Much more successful was the Application made by Sir John Greenville, who being an active Agent for the King, and a near Kinsman to the Generall, was therefore by his Majesty thought a fit person to be employed to him; but he knowing the wary temper of the Generall, was much troubled how to get access to him; till bethinking himself of Mr. Morrice, his Neighbour in the Countrey, a person often conversant with the Generall, he concluded by his mediation to do it, and thereupon requested him to let the Generall know, he had something of great Importance to impart to him, and desired he would give him the opportunity to do it.

When Mr. Morrice inform'd the Generall of this, he receiv'd it with much Strangeness; for although Sir John was his near Relation; yet by reason of his youth, and the Generalls long absence from his Country, they had little acquaintance with each other, and therefore he told Mr. Morrice, Except he would send him information by him, of the nature of his business, he could not admit of any intercourse with him.

Mr. Morrice told him, He had already desired to know that, but Greenville refused it. The Generall in his mind, liked well of this reservedness in Sir John, and bid Mr. Morrice acquaint him, That if he came the next day at nine in the Evening to St. James's, he would speak with him: And accordingly Greenville came to him, at the appointed time, which was the next Evening; after the dissolution of the Parliament.

His reception.

When he came, after he had desired Pardon for the importunity of his visit, he desired his permission to deliver a Message he had to him from his Majesty. The Generall seem'd surpris'd at this saying, but seeing that there was nobody in the Room but Mr. Morrice, and he at a good distance from them, he bid him say what he pleas'd.

He delivers his Message.

He then presented to him a Letter from the King, &c. told him, That his Majesty had great Confidence in his affections to him, and since he had complied so far with the desires of all the sober part of the Kingdom, for the admission of the Secluded Members, in order to a free Parliament; The consequences of that could not but give a sufficient evidence of his Inclinations to his Majesties Service and Restitution, which would naturally flowe from his Endeavours, in Conjunction with their Councils.

The Generalls Answer.

The Generall replied, That he had long lamented the miserable distractions, of his Native Country, and waited a fit occasion to contribute his assistance to the Redemption of it. And when Lambert and those with him had interrupted the Parliament; Considering that the Army had been newly in a great measure by that Parliament modell'd; he supposed by a Declaration for their Restitution he might gain a Power in his hands for better purposes, and, as the better to bring these his purposes about, he resolv'd if by his Arms the Parliament should be restored, together with those few Members which sat at their interruption, to admit those also who had been seclud'd, intending to that end, by degrees, to put his Army into such hands as would favour his intentions; that it was well known to all, How he was disappointed in that design, and through what difficulties he arriv'd to the Station he was then in, nor was he even at that time secure from great danger of disappointment, if he should not manage his affairs with more then ordinary secrecy.

As to the Kings Majesty (he said) None wish'd him greater felicity than he, nor desired his Restoration with more passion; but if it were not cautiously attempted, it would be out of his Power to serve him in it, since in Councils of so nice concernment, there would not be room for two Errors. The People he told him, had been long seduc'd by seditious insinuations, and the Army in the hands of such, as had always been against his Royall Father, and many of them even against Monarchy it self; but nevertheless, he hoped, if they might find the same security under his Majesties Government, as they had under the usurpers of it, he might not despair of their reduction to obedience. And to effect this, it was his humble advice, that his Majesty should prevent their fears, by declaring a free and generall Pardon to all his Subjects, and engage himself to give it under the Great Seal, to all that should submit to his Authority, except such as should be exempted by the Parliament.

And that he would consent to any Act or Acts of Parliament, that should be presented to him for the settlement of publique Sales and Dispositions of Lands, to Officers, Souldiers, and others; and the payment of the Souldiers Arrears: As also for toleration of Liberty of Conscience to all his Subjects, And that none should be punished for differences in matters of Religion, who should not disturb the publique Peace.

Sir John asked him, what he would give him in Command for himself; and if he would write to his Majesty? Which he excus'd at that time, saying, If his Letter should be intercepted before he had compleated the Reforming the Armies, it would be impossible for him to keep them in temper, or hinder the subversion of all he had hitherto done; Adding, That he sought not his own advantage in his Endeavours for the publique benefit of his Country; and that having with much hazard, brought matters near to a fair issue, in pursuance of the generall suffrage of the Nations, he was unwilling, by indiscretion, to venture a relapse, but would choose to involve himself in the same Condition with the generality of the People, in expectation of what the next Parliament should bring forth, to the happiness of his Majesty, and all his Kingdoms.

Sir

A Sir John Greenville writ down the substance of this Discourse, and repeated it to the Generall, to be the better able to retain it in his Memory; but as soon as he had read it, he entreated him to bear it in pieces, and conjur'd him to acquaint no person whatsoever with their Conference, except the King himself, and to request him also to conceal it. But above all things, he intreated him, To desire his Majesty from him, to go out of the King of Spains Dominions, to Breda, or some other place under the Government of the States of the United Provinces; for that he had certain Intelligence, he would be detain'd by the King of Spains Ministers, if he stay'd in his Dominions.

And at Sir John's parting from him, he told him, He was glad that this occasion of presenting his Duty to the King, was an effect of his diligence, when he was glad to find so industrious and vigilant in his Majesties Service: of which he had before some experience when his Brother Nicholas came from him into Scotland.

He promis'd to observe all the Generalls Instructions; and when he came to Ostend (where he arriv'd the 23th of March) he put all that had pass'd betwixt them into Writing, and digested it into form, to be presented to his Majesty. And in the Conduct of the whole affair, he was so secret, that the Lord Mordant, who went over with him to his Majesty, knew nothing of it.

At Brussels he retired to a private house, to which his Majesty (upon intimation) very secretly repaired, and with great satisfaction receiv'd the Intelligence he brought; but because he could not prosecute the Generalls desire (as to his removal) without advice for the manner of executing it, he consult'd the Marquess of Ormond, the Lord Chancellor, and Mr. Secretary Nicholas, being persons in whom, from just reason and experience, he had most intire confidence, by whose assistance the matter was so order'd, that in two or three dayes, he took his Journey to Breda; where we shall leave his Majesty in Consultation, to return to the Transactions in England, of that busie time.

The Council of State took care to have the Act put into speedy execution throughout England, for the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, and for putting the Militia into sober hands: And because many seditious People were endeavouring to debauch the Army, they published a Proclamation to forbid all persons whatsoever, to correspond with any of the Officers and Souldiers of the Army in the way of agitating, or otherwise, whereby any dissatisfaction might be rais'd towards the present Government, to endanger the peace of the Nation, giving power to all Officers, both Military and Civil, to seize upon any Persons offending as aforesaid; And for the better encouragement of all whom it should concern, they declared, and promised to give to the discoverer of any such said person, who should apprehend and secure such offenders, the sum of ten pounds. And this Proclamation was order'd to be published in the Head of every Regiment, Troop, and Company of the Army, to the intent, the same should be the better taken notice of, and put in more effectual execution: And the Generall sent it to every Regiment to be proclaimed accordingly. But this did not sufficiently prevent the ill humours amongst the Souldiers, which made Commissary Clarges consult privately with the Generall, about some other more effectual course; he propos'd to frame an Engagement for all to subscribe, to acquiesce in whatsoever the next Parliament should do, and to displace all that should refuse: His Lordship liked very well of this Proposition, but thought it very hard to be executed; nevertheless, he encouraged him to go on, and that night he alone fram'd it, and immediately advis'd with Colonel Howard, Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper, Mr. Ansley, and Colonel Knight (who all of them with one consent approv'd it, being all Persons of great Credit with the Generall) about the putting it in execution; Colonel Knight undertook by the next day at noon, to get it Signed by all the Officers of his own Regiment, and the Generalls Regiment of Horse, and the Life-Guard; and Colonel Howard did the like for his Regiment which lay about Croydon, for he had so modell'd it, that he was sure of all his Officers; all which by the foresaid time, being accordingly effected, they met together, at Sir Anthony Ashley-Coopers Lodging, and glad to see their business so well advanc'd by the subscription of these three Regiments, they in the next place, thought it expedient to have the Officers of all the Regiments in London, to be summon'd to meet that Evening at St. James's; which was accordingly done, and they being all met, It was mov'd to them by Colonel Knight,

That at this time, when several Imputations lay upon the Army of Inconstancy, and that many Dissent'd Persons were endeavouring to divide them, it was requisite they should give some publique Testimony of their Affections and Inclinations; and in order therunto, some Officers having shew'd him an Address, which they had fram'd to be presented to the Generall, to testify their Resolution of Obedience and Duty, to the Powers God had plac'd over them; He could not but approve so well of it, as readily by him to those who first advis'd it, to be tender'd to every Regiment of the Army; of which, there being a great care here, they had by the Generalls Permission invited them thither, to communicate what was done, and to desire their Concurrence with them in it.

Colonel Knight and Clarges had before pregared most of the Officers of the Regiments which came from Scotland, so that they made no difficulty of it, especially seeing a Subscription of other Regiments to induce them; Moreover, it was intimated, That their Meeting was by the privacy and permission of the Generall, which Obligation they knew none would offer to oppose. The Address was immediately read, and was in these words:

Sir John takes his Journey towards Brussels.

He gives his Majesty an account of his Negotiation, and the effects thereof. The King resolves to Breda.

The Council of State set forth a Proclamation for the preventing of tumults and disturbances.

Commissary Clarges drawn up an Engagement to be subscribed for acquiescing in the determinations of the next Parliament.

The Officers of 3 Regiments subscribe it.

the Armies Ingagement.

VEE the Officers of the Army, under your Excellencies Command, whose Names are hereunto written, being truly sensible of the merciful and wonderful Providence of Almighty God, in bringing us, after so many Revolutions and Changes, into an hopeful way of Settlement: and perceiving, to our great grief, that there are too many, who seeking more their own private Interest, than the Publique Good, are endeavouring to reduce us again to our old Necessities and Confusions; and that they have proceeded so far, as to cause Jealousies in the Council of State, in whom the Supreme Power and Trust, now, till the Meeting of the Parliament, is residing, do hold it our Duties, for the preventing of all such Jealousies for the future, & for the strengthening of your Excellencies Hands, in the carrying on of this Good Work, in which it hath pleased God to make you so highly Instrumental, humbly to make this Address unto your Excellency, in the Name of our selves, and all the Souldiers under our Command, and to Declare, That we shall, according to our Duties, carry and behave our selves, as Officers of an Army instructed by your Example and Discipline, to obey, and not to dispute the Orders of our Superiours, and shall freely and readily observe such Commands, as we shall receive from your Excellency, or the Council of State, or the Parliament, when Assembled: And, in particular, we shall, according to the late Proclamation of the Council of State, of the 17th of March, decline any Meeting or Meetings, for the contriving or carrying on of any Declaration or Subscriptions, concerning Affairs of State, or Government, thereby avoiding those Mischiefs, which made many lately in Arms, so justly distastful to the People, by making themselves a divided Interest from the rest of them. And we are the more willing to make this Address at this time, to evince to all the World the Integrity of our Obedience, because of the great Expectation of the next Parliament, from whom we hope for a happy Settlement to all the Nations; And that they may have no ill Apprehensions of us, we are resolved, as it becomes us in Duty, to submit to whatsoever the Lord shall bring forth from their Consultations, knowing that Parliaments only can secure us in our Religious and Civil Rights: And forasmuch as many Representations heretofore made to Persons in Eminent Authority, have been too frequently contriv'd in the Name of the Army, which were done rather in Formality, (as we perceive by the Event) than otherwise; We do solemnly desire, that this may be Recorded as a Testimony and Witness against us, if ever we shall be guilty of any such Backslidings.

At that very time, this Ingegument was signed by Lieutenant-Colonel Morgan, and all the Officers of the Generals Regiment of Foot; by Colonel Hubblehorn, and all the Officers of his Regiment; by Colonel Claberry, Colonel Lydcott, Colonel Read, and the rest, with all their Officers; which made up in all, with those that had sign'd before, Ten Regiments of Horse and Foot, besides the Life-Guard, and all the General-Officers. Also, Colonel Fairfax, and Colonel Beibel, who upon the first Consultation of this Matter had been sent unto, in four dayes had return'd the Subscriptions of themselves, and all their Officers; after which it was agreed, That Colonel Howard, with forty Officers, should present it to the General; which was done at St. James's the 9th Day of April, and was with much satisfaction and content received by him: It was also afterwards recommended to Major-General Morgan in Scotland, to have it subscribed by his Officers there, and likewise to all the Regiments in England, with an Account of what had bin done in London, and the Names of all those Regiments that had concurr'd in it.

Two more Regiments sent into Scotland.

Lambert etc. put out of the Tower.

And because he heard that some disaffected Persons were tampering to seduce the Souldiers in Scotland, he sent another Regiment of Horse, and a Regiment of Foot thither, who were of such as Major-General Morgan might confide in, to assist him, if need were, to model the rest. In conclusion, this Address was subscribed by all the Regiments, and the Subscriptions return'd to the General; only some Officers refus'd it, and were immediately displaced, and the General took that opportunity of giving to the Lord Faulconbridge, Colonel Rossiter, and General Monmouth, to each of them a Regiment of Horse, and to Colonel Sheffield a Regiment of Foot. And whilst he was thus employ'd in ordering the Army, the Council of State was active in forming the Militia, in all the Cities and Counties of England and Wales, wherein such care was taken, to have the Arms in good Hands, that from all Parts the Lists of the Officers were sent to the Council of State, to be by the General and them approv'd.

These Preparations enraged many Factious People to design against the Government, inasmuch that on the Evening of that Day, wherein Colonel Howard presented the above-mentioned Address to the General, Colonel Lambert having made an Escape out of the Tower, was conceal'd by some of that Party, that had been lately engaged against General Monk, and some others of Fanatique Principles: These held a Council in London, but were not so private in their Consultations; but the General had from time to time intimation of such of their Proceedings. They sent

A sent some busie men to all the Regiments in England, and these Officers that refus'd the Address, had intic'd many of the Troopers to rise after them; but such was the vigilance of the rest of the Officers, that there got not above Seven or Eight Troops of Horse in a Body to joyn with Lambert, and but one Company of Foot.

On Wednesday the 18th of April, the Generall, upon Advice from Colonel Sireater, of Lamberts hovering in the North Parts, and of the want of Horse in his Quarters; sent for Colonel Ingoldby to him, and told him, He must be at Northampton with his Regiment on the Saturday following; and that he should receive Orders to take any of Colonel Rossiters Troops to his Assistance, which quartered in those Parts: He also told him, That Colonel Sireater, a Person whom he could Trust, was with some of his Companies at Northampton, whom he would find ready to joyn with him. The Colonel told him, That his Regiment was dispersed in Norfolk and Suffolk, but he would do his endeavours to get them together. And he was so diligent herein, that by the Friday following he got his Regiment to Cambridge, and on Saturday in the Evening to Northampton.

The General also sent Colonel Howard with his Regiment, and some other select Troops, towards Worestershire and Warwickshire, to hinder any Defection of the Troops in those Parts, and to have an Eye towards Coventry, which Lambert had design'd to Garrison; and indeed he had done it, had not the Care of the General prevented it, by Ordering Three Companies of Colonel Sireater's Regiment to Quarter in that City: The Colonel also sending one Company more to strengthen that Place, who in their March met with a Party of Horse, among whom was one who having been Major to that Regiment, shew'd them Lambert's Orders to march back again: But the Lieutenant that was Intrusted with the Command of that Company, observing the Colonel's Orders, march'd in with great speed, stood upon his defence, and oppos'd them Twice in his march thither.

The Council of State by Proclamation, declar'd Lambert and his Adherents Traytors, and the General was careful the very next day after his getting out of Prison, to give Notice of it to all the Regiments and Troops, to prevent his Design of seducing them, and to command them to seize on him: By which Diligence, and the sending these Parties out, his Confederates were interrupted in their Endeavours. One Merry, a Disbanded discontented Officer of Col. Smithsow's Regiment, had incited forty of Captain Foverell's Troop to revolt, with Design to seize on York, but by the care of other Troops they were dispersed; and one Everard, and Captain Lockier, two discontented Officers, that had been lately in Custody, and releas'd upon their Engagement, not to act any thing in Disturbance of the Publique Peace, did nevertheless march through Nottingham, with a Seditious Troop of their Companions.

Whereof Captain Sherman of Colonel Sanders his Regiment, having notice, drew out his own Troop, and that of Captain Craddock of Hackers Regiment, to engage them: but immediately Craddock's Troop joyn'd with the Enemy, which made Sherman (finding himself too weak for them) to retreat to Nottingham, to secure that place, where the Mayor, Aldermen, and Gentry, gave him ready assistance. This Newes made the General give Orders, That the late Address signed by the Officers, should be tender'd to all the private Souldiers also, which made so through a Reformation, that in many Regiments Thirty of a Troop disbanded, rather than they would consent to it, and many in the Foot Companies also left their Arms: But in all the General's Regiments in London, that march'd with him from Scotland, there were but two Dissenters.

On Easter-Even, Colonel Ingoldby joyn'd with Colonel Sireater at Northampton; where was at that time, and had been some dayes before, the Earl of Essex who with severall Loyall Gentlemen of that County, to the number of near One hundred Horse, with much Resolution offer'd to assist Colonel Sireater: Likewise the Trained Bands of that Town were in Arms at the same time, in order to the securing of that Place, in case of a Necessity of Colonel Sireaters attending Lamberts Motion: The Colonel purposing that Night, if need had been, to have mounted 400 Foot of his Regiment with the Horses that came into the Town that day (against the Fair on Monday following), and to have beaten up Lamberts Quarters.

On Easter-Day early, Intelligence was brought to Colonel Ingoldby and Colonel Sireater, That Lambert was at Daventry; upon which they march'd towards him: When they came to Daventry, they heard Lambert was march'd two miles from thence, and therefore halt'd to meet him; which they did in a plain Field, where a little Brook parted them; Lambert had with him, besides the Troops of Horse before-mentioned, these Persons, viz. Colonel Okey, Colonel Astell, Colonel Gobbe, Lieutenant-Colonel Young, Major Creed, Captain Timothy Clare, Captain Gregory, Captain Spingee, besides divers private Souldiers, who were Anabaptists.

The two Parties fac'd one the other near four hours; during which time, Colonel Ingoldby, and Colonel Sireater spent their time, partly in their vigilant observation of the Intention of the Enemy, and partly in Encouraging of the Horse and Foot under their Command, whereby they begot a more than ordinary Resolution in both Horse and Foot: In the mean time, Lambert sent out several Scouts towards them; but Ingoldby would not permit any of his to leave their Ranks, only he himself riding up towards them, had many Discourses with them; Ingoldby was not known to the Scouts, but appearing to them as a private Souldier, dealt so effectually with them, by laying open the danger of their Action, that 25 Troopers, with a Quarter-Master, came over to him. The Colonel dismounted and disarm'd them for the present, because they were unwilling to engage in his part, but afterwards restored their Horses and Arms to them.

Lamberts

him Prisoner.

Lambert's delay in Engaging being observed by Col. Streeter, he Advised, That both Horse A and Foot should immediately advance, and put the Business to an Issue, out of the Confidence he had of the Foot especially: And withall desired Col. Ingoldsby, That if he should be Rout'd, he would Rally with what speed he could; For that he should be Confident to find the Foot to maintain their Ground. Colonel Streeter's Foot being about Five Hundred; two Compleat Companies, the rest Commanded Men out of several Companies, most Pikes, which in that Champion-Ground would serve well to secure the Body against the Horse.

When the two Bodies came near, just as Col. Ingoldsby was going to Charge, Colonel Streeter Commanded Six Files of Musqueteers to advance, one File gave fire, and hurt one or two of Lambert's Horse; his Drums beat, and in good Order he advanced, having given strict Command that his Musqueteers should not fire till they came as near as Push of Pike. But Lambert's men held the Notes of their Pistols towards the Ground, and Nelbropps Troop came off to Ingoldsby; Hestriggs Troop having deserted him before; for Colonel Ingoldsby sending Captain Elmore before him with a party, as he march'd to find Lambert, met Captain Hestrigg, and took him prisoner, but releas'd him upon his Parole, to send his whole Troop over to joyn with Ingoldsby, which he faithfully perform'd, sending it to them by his Quarter-Master, but he retir'd himself: Colonel Ingoldsby told Lambert, He was his Prisoner; Whereupon Creed and the rest earnestly intreated him, to do what he pleas'd with them, but to permit Lambert to escape; acquainting him, That his Life could be of no advantage to him; Which Ingoldsby absolutely refused, telling them, He would not be treacherous to those that had commanded him by such an ungenerous Act: Lambert then turned about his Horse, and attempted to escape, but Ingoldsby pursued him so close, that he came quickly up to him, and vow'd to pistol him, if he did not immediately yield. Lambert, in great depression of Spirit, twice pray'd him to let him escape; but when he saw he could not prevail, submitted, as all the rest did, except Okey, Axell, and Cleer, who escaped.

acquires the Council of State with the
the Fleet.

General Mountague, who had been some time before by the Generals Advice, made one of the Generals at Sea, (General Monk being himself the other) and sent to take charge of the Fleet, sent an Account to the Council of State, of the Condition of it, how that Vice-Admiral Lawson, and with him the whole Navy, had receiv'd him with great satisfaction, and were all fix'd in obedience to their Authority, with Resolutions to submit to the Determination of the next Parliament.

The Appearance of the
the Park.

The Tuesday after this Defeat of Lambert, all the Militia of the City of London drew into Hide-Park; there were Six Trained-Band Regiments, the Red, the White, the Green, the Blew, the Yellow, and the Orange, besides several Regiments of Auxiliaries: The Red was commanded by Colonel Bateman Alderman, the White by Colonel Wale Alderman, the Green by Colonel John Robinson Alderman, the Blew by Colonel William Vincent, the Yellow by Colonel William Bromfield, and the Orange by Colonel Thomas Bloodworth, all men of Courage and good Affections, to the Peace and Felicity of their Native Country. They made up in all Twelve Thousand Men: The General, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and a great Concourse of Noble-men and Gentlemen, were present at the Appearance. And that Evening, Colonel Lambert, Colonel Cobbet, and Major Creed, were brought Prisoners to the Council of State, and committed to the Tower. And the next day the rest of the Prisoners were brought by Captain Parry to the General, and by him committed to the Marshal-General.

Col. Leubert,
Col. Cobbet, &c.
others, sent prisoners to the Tower.

Several Seditious Pamphlets publish'd and dispers'd.

The Defeat of Lambert did not make the Phanatiques leave the pursuit of their Mischief, several Seditious Pamphlets being published in Print to deprave the Minds of the People, and Tickets were thrown into the Courts of Guard in the Night to debauch the Souldiers. But none of them appear'd to have been penn'd with more virulency and malice, than that vile supposititious Paper which they scatter'd about, carrying in its Front-piece, A Letter from Brussels, &c. with which some of his Majesties most implacable Enemies (by some suspected to be Nevil) attempted to poison, or palliate the now high Expectations, and Impressions of his good Subjects: And it was in truth so fatally tim'd, and so subtilly contriv'd, that it had like to have done a great deal of Mischief amongst some, who not acquainted with the innate, and unparalleled Inclination of his Majesty to Clemency, began to apprehend their forwardness for his Restoration, and to remit of their former Zeal: But this Hydra was dextrously cut off by Mr. Evelyn, whom we formerly mention'd, in a Reply which was Printed, to the inire satisfaction of all that read it. I take pleasure to mention the Particular, because upon another occasion, long before, he publish'd, with no small hazard of his Life and Liberty, his Apology to the Royal Party, in Answer to that Remonstrance, Entitled the Plea of the Army, (contriv'd and set forth by that Phanatick Power, immediately upon their Dethroning of Richard.) as being it seems no longer able to support the common, but unjust Reproaches of his Majesties Cause, by Arguments deriv'd from their ill Conduct, and Fatal Success of divers of his suffering Party; and because I take it to be the boldest Piece (not excepting even the famous Killing no Murderer; written, as we since learn, by Captain Tim) that ever durst see the Light in that raging Period; and for that it was no less than thrice re-printed (an Honour which the Pamphlets of that Age did seldom arrive to) and observ'd to have won more Proselytes to the King, and kept up the fervour of his then almost expiring Party, than any thing of that nature had done before it; which, believe it, was a Service (however look'd upon and esteem'd) the greatest that Conjecture was capable of, and none of the least to his Majesties Advantage all along; as those who shall please to call to mind the Effects of these Paper-Weapons, must needs acknowledge, by warming and inspiring the Hearts of a Languishing and almost desponding People.

A in danger of being poison'd by the perpetual Venome of his Majesties Adversaries, whose Pens as well as Swords, were daily sharpen'd against him, but for such seasonable Antidotes, as upon all occasions encountered their Libels, and insidious Discourses; amongst which there were also several Letters sent to the General from unknown Hands, to subvert his Allegiance likewise; and to Clarify it was written, That notwithstanding his Practices, to introduce the King and his Family, all his Endeavours were blasted by Morrice, who had ascribed to himself alone the Reputation of that Service, and dispersed to all the Royal Party, that he had no Credit with the General, and therefore to him only Application should be made, as to one in whom the General reposed his greatest Trust. But these and all other Artifices were too poor to subvert the Loyalty of one, who valued not to whom the good of his Service was attributed, if the Effects he desired were produced by them: But nevertheless, these Practices, to divide the Generals Friends, made the Council of State, the General, and all his Officers, more watchful for the Publique Peace, and more diligent in their Duties: The Officers began more and more to be convinced of their former Errors, by several publique and private Discourses of the Clemency and other Royal Indowments of his Majesty: That which they most apprehended, was from Rumours which had been dispersed amongst them, of the implacability of all those of his Party, of whom it was said, If they had Power they would shew themselves full of Rancour and Revenge against all that were engaged in the late War against them: and observing that most of the Members of Parliament were such, notwithstanding all the Qualifications for their Elections, many strange Doubts possessed them; and amongst other Effects of their Diseased Imaginations, they fancied, the Parliament (when met) would rather hinder, than promote his Majesties Goodness and Mercy towards them: But whilst they were in the midst of these various Inquietudes, the Royal Party, in all the Counties of England, published several excellent Declarations, which fully satisfied and appeased their Minds, wherein they Declared, That they resolved to adhere to the largest Assurances of amicable Agreement with all Persons, and that they would never put any Difference betwixt such as should now unite with them, and those who first engaged in the same Persuasion with themselves. Of all which, we shall only herein publish one, they being all to the same purpose: It was Intituled,

A Declaration of the Nobility and Gentry, that adhered to the late King in and about the City of London; which was expressed in these words:

“After the Miseries of a Civil Warre, and the many and fruitless Attempts “Towards Settlement, upon several Interests, and imaginary Forms of Go“vernment, It having pleas'd Almighty God, by unexpected and wonderfull “means, to give these Nations a probable hope of being restored to those “Laws and Priviledges, which have been transmitted to them from their An“cestors; We do Declare, That we think our selves oblig'd, next to Divine “Providence, to attribute this Gracious Work to his Excellency the Lord “General Monk, who, as he had the Courage to assert the Publique Liberty, “and the Prudence to carry it on against so many Difficulties, has also had the “Happinefs, to lead Us thus far through the Wilderness of Confusion, without “passing the Red-Sea of Blood; And because the Enemies of the Publique “Peace, have endeavour'd to represent those of the Kings Party, as men impla“cable, and such as would sacrifice the Common Good to their own private “Passions; We do sincerely profess, That we do reflect upon our past suf“ferings from the Hands of God, and therefore do not cherish any violent “Thoughts or Inclinations, to have been any way Instrumental in them; And “if the Indiscretion of any Spirited Persons, transports them to Expressions con“trary to this our sence, we utterly disclaim them. And desire, that the Im“putation may extend no further, than the Folly of the Offenders. And we “further Declare, That we intend by our quiet and peaceable Behaviour, to “testifie our submission to the present Power, as it now resides in the Council of “State, in expectation of the future Parliament; upon whose Wisdome and “Determinations, we trust God will give such a Blessing, as may produce a “perfect settlement, both in Church and State.

The Declaration of the Nobility and Gentry about London.

“And as his Excellency hath not chosen the sandy Foundations of self-Gov-“vernment, but the firm Rock of National Interest; whereon to frame a Settle“ment; It is our Hope and Prayer, That when the Building comes to be rais“ed, it may not like Rome, have the beginning in the Blood of Brethren, nor “like Babel, be interrupted by the Confusion of Tongues; but that we may all “speak one Language, and be of one Name; That all mention of Parties and “Factions

The Parliament assembled.

This and the other Declarations of the same nature, were wholesome Preparations to usher in the Parliament, which met at Westminster on the 25th day of April; The Lords chose the Earl of Manchester to be their Speaker; and the House of Commons Sir Harebottle Grimstone; where after the appointment of the usuall Committees for Priviledges, and other essentiall matters usuall at their first Assembling, They gave all due acknowledgments to Generall Monk, for his Eminent Services and great Wifdome in subduing his Enemies without Blood, magnifying the Mercies of God, That made him so Instrumentall to keep up the Nations from sinking, when no way appeared whence Deliverance should arise.

Sir Arthur Haslerigg being suspected by the Generall, clears himself.

Sir Arthur Haslerigg was by the Generall suspected to have contributed towards the Infurrection of Lambert; but upon notice thereof, he came to him, and gave him evident proofs to the contrary, and promised to live peaceably at home; having before quietly submitted his Regiments of Horse and Foot to the Generall's dispose, together with the Garrisons of Burnick, New-Castle, Carlisle, and Timmish.

Sir John Greenwill presents the Generall with a Commission from his Majesty, and a Letter for the Council of State.

On the 27th of April, Sir John Greenwill attended the General, and presented to him a Letter from his Majesty, to be communicated to the Officers of the Army, and the Council of State, with a Commission from his Majesty to constitute him Captain General of all the Armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland; Informing him likewise, That he had Letters from his Majesty to both Houses of Parliament, the City, and the Navy.

His Excellency received the Commission with all Humility and Respect; but in regard the Parliament was Adjourn'd for three dayes, advis'd him the next day to deliver that Letter which was to be by him imparted to the Council of State, to the Council at their next Sitting; which he

he accordingly did, but they would not presume to open it without the Parliaments directions, and took Caution of Sir John Greenwill to attend the House at their next Sitting. At which time, by the Generall's advice, he went, without acquainting them, to the House of Lords, to inform them he had a Letter from the King; who being acquainted that Sir John Greenwill attended at the Door with a Letter from his Majesty, The Earl of Manchester went down to the Clerk and received it. The Letter had a Declaration inclosed in it; which were both read in the House: The Letter first, which was in these words: (Viz.)

CHARLES R.

Right Trusty and Right Welbelov'd Cousins, and Right Trusty and Welbelov'd Cousins, and Trusty and Right Welbelov'd; We Greet you well. We cannot have a better reason to promise Our Self an end of Our Common Sufferings and Calamities, and that Our Own Just Power and Authority will with Gods Blessing be restored to us, Than that we hear You are again acknowledged to have that Authority and Jurisdiction which hath always belonged to you by your Birth, and the Fundamentall Laws of the Land: And we have thought it very fit and safe for us to call to you for your help in the composing the Confounding Distempers and Distractions of the Kingdom, in which your Sufferings are next to those we have undergone Our Self; And therefore you cannot but be the most proper Countellers for removing these Mischiefs, and for preventing the like for the future. How great a Trust we repose in you, for the procuring and establishing a blessed Peace and Security for the Kingdom, will appear to you by Our inclosed Declaration; which Trust, we are most confident you will discharge with what Justice and Wisdom that becomes you, and must always be expected from you; and that upon your experiences, how one violation succeeds another, when the known Relations and Rules of Justice are once transgressed, you will be as Jealous for the Rights of the Crown, and for the Honour of your King, as for your selves: And then you cannot but discharge your Trust with good success, and provide for, and establish the Peace, Happiness and Honour of King, Lords, and Commons, upon that Foundation which can only support it, and we shall be all happy in each other: And as the whole Kingdom will bless God for you all, so we shall hold Our Self obliged in an especiall manner to Thank you in particular, according to the affection you shall express towards us. We need the less enlarge to you upon this Subject, because we have likewise writ to the House of Commons, which we suppose they will communicate to you: And we pray God to bless your Joynt Endeavours for the good of us all. And so we bid you very heartily farewell.

His Majesty's Letter to the House of Lords.

Given at Our Court at Breda, this 23 day of April, 1660. In the Twelfth Year of Our Reign.

The Declaration was next read, which was Intituled,

His Majesty's gracious Declaration to all his Loving Subjects.

CHARLES R.

CHARLES by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all Our Loving Subjects of what Degree or Quality soever, Greeting. If the Generall Distraction and Confusion which is spread over the whole Kingdom; doth not awaken all men to a desire and longings, that those Wounds which have so many Tears together been kept bleeding, may be bound up, all we can say will be to no purpose: However, after this long silence, we have thought it Our Duty to declare how much we desire to contribute thereunto: And that as we can never give over the hope in good time to obtain the Possession of that Right which God and Nature hath made Our due; So we do make it Our daily Suit to the Divine Providence, that he will, in Compassion to us and Our Subjects, after so long Misery and Sufferings, remit, and put us into a quiet and peaceable possession of that Our Right, with as little Blood and Damage to Our People as is possible: Nor do we desire more to enjoy what is Ours, then that all Our Subjects may enjoy what by Law is theirs, by a full and intire administration of Justice throughout the Land; and by extending Our Mercy where it is wanted and deserved.

His Majesty's Declaration.

And to the end that the fear of Punishment may not engage any Conscions, to themselves of what is past, to a perseverance in Guilt for the future, by opposing the Quiet and Happiness piness of their Country in the Restoration both of King, Peers, and People, to their Just, Ancient, and Fundamental Rights. We do by these Presents Declare, That we do grant a Free and Generall Pardon, which we are ready, upon Demand, to passe under Our Great Seal of England, to all Our Subjects of what Degree or Quality soever, who within Forty dayes after the publishing hereof, shall lay hold upon this Our Grace and Favour, and shall by any publique Act declare their doing so, and that they return to the Loyalty and Obedience of good Subjects; Excepting only such Persons as shall hereafter be excepted by Parliament: Those only excepted, Let all Our Subjects, how faulty soever, rely upon the Word of a King, solemnly given by this present Declaration, That no Crime whatsoever Committed against us, or Our Royall Father, before the Publication of this, shall ever rise in Judgment, or be brought in Question, against any of them, to the least Endamagement of them either in their Lives, Liberties, or Estates, or (as far forth as lies in Our Power) so much as to the prejudice of their Reputations, by any reproach, or term of distinction from the rest of any of Our best Subjects; We Desiring and Ordaining, That henceforth all Notes of Discord, Separation, and Difference of Parties be utterly abolished among all Our Subjects, whom we Invite and Conjure to a perfect Union among themselves, under Our Protection, for the re-settlement of Our Just Rights and Thiers, in a Free Parliament, by which upon the Word of a King we will be advised.

And because the Passion and uncharitableness of the Times have produced severall Opinions in Religion, by which men are engaged in Parties and Animosities against each other, which, when they shall hereafter unite in a freedom of Conversation, will be Composed, or better understood; We do declare a Liberty to tender Consciences, And that no man shall be disquieted or called in question for differences of Opinion in matters of Religion, which do not disturb the Peace of the Kingdom, and that we shall be ready to consent to such an Act of Parliament, as upon mature deliberation shall be offered to us, for the full granting that Indulgence.

And because in the continued distractions of so many Years, and so many and great Revolutions, many Grants and Purchases of Estates have been made to and by many Officers, Souldiers, and others, who are now possessed of the same, and who may be liable to Actions at Law, upon severall Titles; We are likewise willing that all such differences, and all things relating to the said Grants, Sales, and Purchases, shall be determined in Parliament, which can best provide for the Just Satisfaction of all men who are concerned.

And we do further declare, That we will be ready to consent to any Act or Acts of Parliament to the purposes aforesaid, And for the full satisfaction of all Arrears due to the Officers and Souldiers of the Army, under the Command of Generall Monck, and that they shall be received into our Service upon as good pay and Conditions as they now enjoy.

Given under Our Sign Manuall and Privy Signet at Our Court at Breda this 14 day of April, 1660. in the Twelfth Year of Our Reign.

After the Reading of these, the Lords Ordered Thanks to be given to Sir John Greenwill, for bringing that Gracious Declaration and Letter, and Resolv'd by Vote, That they do own and declare, That according to the Ancient and Fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, the Government is, and ought to be, by King, Lords, and Commons.

Sir John Greenwill came then to the House of Commons, who were before his Coming acquainted with the Letter he delivered to the Council; upon Notice of his being at the Door, was admitted, and presented a Letter to them from his Majestie. The Letter had in it a Duplicate of the same Declaration which was inclosed in the Letter to the Lords: The Letter and it were both read, and the Letter was Superfcribed;

To Our Trusty and Welbeloved, the Speaker of the House of Commons.

CHARLES R.

His Majesties Letter to the House of Commons.

Trusty and Welbeloved, We Greet you well. In these great and insupportable Afflictions and Calamities under which the poor Nation hath been so long exercised, and by which it is so near exhausted, we cannot think of a more naturall and proper Remedy, than to resort to those for Counsell and Advice, who have seen and observed the first beginning of Our Miseries, the Progress from bad to worse, and the mistakes and misunderstandings which have produced and contributed to Inconveniencies which were not intended; intended; and after so many Revolutions, and the observation of what hath attended them, are now trusted by Our good Subjects to repair the Breaches which are made, and to provide proper Remedies for these Evills, and for the lasting Peace, Happiness and Security of the Kingdom.

We do assure you upon Our Royall Word, That none of Our Predecessors have had a greater Esteem of Parliaments, than we have in our Judgment, as well as from Our Obligation; We do believe them to be so vitall a part of the Constitution of the Kingdom, and so necessary for the Government of it, that we well know neither Prince nor People can be in any tolerable degree happy without them: And therefore you may be confident, That we shall always look upon their Counsells as the best we can receive, and shall be as tender of their Priviledges, and as Carefull to preserve and protect them, as of that which is most near to Our Self, and most necessary for Our Own Preservation.

And as this is Our Opinion of Parliaments, That their Authority is most necessary for the Government of the Kingdom; So we are most confident, that you believe and find, that the preservation of the Kings Authority is as necessary for the preservation of Parliaments; and that it is not the Name but the right Constitution of them, which can prepare and apply proper Remedies for those Evills which are grievous to the People, and which can thereby establish their Peace and Security. And therefore we have not the least doubt, but that you will be as Tender in, and as Jealous of, any thing that may infringe Our Honour, or impair Our Authority, as of your own Liberty and Property; which is best preserv'd by preserving the other.

How far we have trusted you in this great Affair, and how much it is in your Power to restore the Nation to all that it hath lost, and to redeem it from any Infamy it hath undergone, and to make King and People as happy as they ought to be; You will find by Our inclosed Declaration, a Copy of which we have likewise sent to the House of Peers; and you will easily believe that we would not voluntarily, and of Our Self have reposed so great a Trust in you, but upon an intire Confidence that you will not abuse it, and that you will proceed in such a manner, and with such due consideration of us who have trusted you, that we shall not be ashamed of declining other Assistance (which we have assurance of) and repairing to you for more naturall and proper Remedies for the Evills we would be freed from, nor sorry that we have bound up Our Own Interest so intirely with that of Our Subjects, as that we refer it to the same Persons to take care of us, who are trusted to provide for them.

We look upon you as wise and dispassionate Men, and good Patriots, who will raise up those Banks and Fences which have been cast down, and who will most reasonably hope, that the same Prosperity will again spring from those Roots from which it hath heretofore and alwayes grown; Nor can we apprehend that you will propose any thing to us, or expect any thing from us, but that we are as ready to give, as you to receive.

If you desire the advancement and Propagation of the Protestant Religion, we have, by Our constant Profession and Practice of it, given sufficient Testimony to the World, that neither the unkindness of those of the same Faith towards us, nor the Civilities and Obligations from those of a contrary Profession, (of both which we have had abundant Evidence) could in the least degree startle us, or make us swerve from our zeal and affection for it; to which we will not readily consent. And we hope in due time Our Self to propose something to you for the Propagation of it, that will satisfy the World, that we have alwayes made it both Our Care and Our Study; and have enough observed what is most like to bring disadvantage to it.

If you desire security for these, who in these Calamitous times either wilfully or weakly have transgressed those bounds which were prescribed, and have invaded each others Rights, we have left to you to provide for their Security and Indemnity, and in such a way as you shall think Just and Reasonable; And by a Just Computation of what men have done, and suffered, as near as is possible, to take care that all men be satisfied, which is the surest way to suppress and extirpate all such uncharitableness and animosity, as might hereafter shake and threaten that Peace which for the present might seem established.

If there be a crying Sinne for which the Nation may be involv'd in the infamy that attends it, we cannot doubt but that you will be as solicitous to Redeem and Vindicate the Nation from that Guilt and Infamy, as we can be.

If you desire that Reverence and obedience may be paid to the fundamentall Laws of the Land, and that Justice may be equally and impartially administred to all men, it is that which we desire to be sworn to Our Self; and that all Persons in Power and Authority should be so too.

In a word, there is nothing which you can propose, that may make the Kingdom happy, which we will not contend with you to compass; and upon this Confidence and Assurance, we have thought fit to send you this Declaration, that you may, as much as is possible, at this distance, see Our heart, which when God shall bring us nearer together (as we hope he will do shortly) will appear to you very agreeable to what we have professed; and we hope, that we have made that right Christian use of Our Affliction, and that the Observation and experience we have had in other Countries, hath been such, as that we, and we hope all Our Subjects, shall be the better for what we have seen and suffered.

We shall add no more, but our Prayers to Almighty God, that He will so bless your Counsels, and direct your endeavours, that his Glory and worship may be provided for, and the Peace, Honour, and Happiness of the Nation, may be established upon those foundations which can best support it. And so we bid you farewell.

After the reading of this Letter and the Declaration, his Excellency the Lord Generall desired the Letter that was directed to him, to be Communicated to the Council and the Army, might also be read, which was agreed. In that Letter there was also the former Declaration inclosed, and the Address of the Letter was:

To our Trusty and Welbelov'd General Monck, to be by him Communicated to the President and Council of State, and to the Officers of the Armies under his Command.

CHARLES R.

His Majesties Letter to the Generall, to be communicated to the Officers of the Army, and Council of State.

Truſty and Welbelov'd, We greet you well: It cannot be believ'd, but that we have been, are, and ever muſt be, as ſolicitous as we can, by all endeavours to improve the affections of Our good Subjects at home, and to procure the aſſiſtance of Our Friends and Allies abroad, for the recovery of that right, which by the Laws of God and Man is unquestionable, and of which we have been ſo long diſpoſſeſſed by ſuch force, and with thoſe Circumſtances, as we do not deſire to aggravate by any ſharp expreſſions, but rather wiſh, that the memory of what is paſſed, may be buried to the world. That we have more endeavour'd to prepare, and to improve the Affections of Our Subjects at home, for Our Reſtauration, than to procure Aſſiſtance from abroad, to invade either of Our Kingdoms, is as manifeſt to the world: And we cannot give a better Evidence, that we are ſtill of the ſame minde, than in this Conjunction, when common reaſon muſt ſatiſſie all men, that we cannot be without Aſſiſtance from abroad, we chooſe rather to ſend to you, who have it in your own power to prevent that ruine and deſolation which a Warre would bring upon the Nation, and to make the whole Kingdom owe the Peace, Happineſs, Security, and Glory it ſhall enjoy to your Vertue; and to acknowledge that your Armies have complied with their Obligations for which they were firſt raiſed, for the preſervation of the Proteſtant Religion, the Honour and Dignity of the King, the Priviledges of Parliament, the Liberty and Property of the Subject, and the fundamentall Laws of the Land; and that you have vindicated that Truſt, which others moſt perfidiouſly abuſed and betrayed.

How much we deſire and Reſolve to contribute to thoſe good ends, will appear to you by Our enclod ſed Declaration, which we deſire you to cauſe to be publiſh'd for the Information and Satisfaction of all good Subjects, who do not deſire a further effuſion of precious Chriſtian Blood, but to have their Peace and Security founded upon that which can only ſupport it; an Unity of Affections amongſt Our ſelves, an equall adminiſtration of Juſtice to men, reſtoring Parliaments to a full Capacity of providing for all that is amiſs, and the Laws of the Land to their due veneration.

You have been your ſelves witneſſes of ſo many Revolutions, and have had ſo much experience, how far any Power and Authority that is only aſſum'd by Paſſion and Appetite, and not ſupported by Juſtice, is from providing for the happineſs and peace of the People;

A or from receiving any obedience from them, without which no Government can provide for them; and that you may very reaſonably believe that God hath not been ſo well pleaſed with the attempt that have been made, ſince he hath uſually increaſed the Confuſion; by giving all the ſucceſs that hath been deſired, and brought that to paſſe without effect, which the deſigners have propos'd as the beſt means to ſettle and Compoſe the Nation: And therefore we cannot but hope and believe, that you will concur with us in the Remedy we have apply'd, which to humane underſtandings, is only proper for the ill we all groan under; and that you will make your ſelves the Bleſſed Inſtruments to bring this Bleſſing of Peace and Reconciliation upon King and People; it being the uſuall method in which Divine Providence delighteth it ſelf, to uſe and ſanctiſie thoſe very means which ill men deſign for the ſatisfaction of private and particular ends and ambition, and other wicked purpoſes, to whoſome and publique ends, and to eſta bliſh that good which is moſt contrary to the deſigners; which is the greateſt manifeſtation of Gods particular kindneſs to a Nation that can be given in this world. How far we reſolve to preſerve your Interests, and reward your Services, we refer to Our Declaration; And we hope God will inſpire you to perform your duty to us, and to your Native Countrey, whoſe happineſs cannot be ſeperated from each other.

C We have intruſted Our Welbelov'd Servant Sir John Greenville, one of the Gentlemen of Our Bed-chamber, to deliver this unto you, and to give us an account of your reception of it; and to deſire you, that it may be publiſh'd. And ſo we bid you farewell.

Given at our Court at Breda, this 14th of April, 1660.
In the twelfth Year of our Reign.

After the reading of theſe Letters, his Excellency deſired their permiſſion to anſwer it, and to Communicate that and his Majesties Declaration to the Officers of the Army; which was readily conſented to.

D And then they took into their Conſideration, That his Majesty having been deprived of his Revenues, could not but be in want of Monies; and therefore Order'd, That the Summ of Fifty Thouſand Pounds ſhould be preſently raiſed and preſented to his Majesty from that Houſe, and Ten Thouſand Pounds to his Royall Highneſs the Duke of York, and Five Thouſand Pounds to the Duke of Glouceſter.

The Lo diſſent down a Motion to the Commons, with the Vote of Recognition formerly mentioned, which was agreed to, and each of the Houſes appointed Committees to draw up their ſeverall Anſwers to his Majesties Letters, and Reſolv'd, that the Superſcription ſhould be,

E To the King's most Excellent Majesty.

And the Commons Order'd, That all the Journalls ſhould be ſearch'd, and thoſe Acts and Orders razed out, which were inconfiſtent with the Government of King, Lords, and Commons; Theſe were the chiefſt Tranſactions in Parliament that day.

In the Evening his Excellency ſummoned all his Officers that were in and near the City, and Communicated to them his Majesties Letter and Declaration; upon the reading whereof, Colonel Lydcot firſt ſpoke; addreſſing himſelf to his Excellency then preſent; He ſaid, They were all bound to bleſs God for the happineſs of that day, which made them Witneſſes of his Majesties great goodneſs and Clemency to all his Subjects expreſſed in that Declaration, and for his particular kindneſs to them manifeſt in his moſt gracious Letter.

F He ſaid, It was moſt true, that they had been Witneſſes of many Revolutions (as it is therein expreſſed) and experienced to their ſorrow the inconveniencies of them; That at the beginning of the Wars, the ſafety of the Kings Perſon, Proteſtant Religion, Priviledges of Parliament, and Liberty of the Subjects, were Principles that many good men with them thought they might ſafely engage for; but by degrees after they came into Blood, ſome implacable Spirits improved their Succeſſes to make the diſſentions irreparable, and many men were forc'd to continue their Arms, more for their own ſecurity than the Juſtice of them; But that which was his comfort, and ought to be all theirs, was, That they had now by the Prudence of their ever to be honour'd Generall, the opportunity to comply with the Obligations for which they were firſt raiſed, and they were theſe whom his Majesty was pleas'd to own in their ſubmiſſion to his moſt juſt and Lawfull Authority, to be the Inſtruments to bring the bleſſing of Peace and Reconciliation upon the King and People.

This Speech was approv'd by all them that heard it; But Colonel Knight deſired they might give ſome written Teſtimony of their acknowledgements of his Majesties Authority over them, to be preſented to his Excellency the Lord Generall; That ſince his Majesties Letter was by him communicated to them, he might in his Anſwer to it, return their humble ſence of it.

Coll. Lydcot's Speech upon the reading of his Majesties Letter and Declaration.

1660.

This motion produc'd a Reference to a Committee of Officers, to draw up an Address to his A Excellency, in Compliance with his Majesties Letter and Declaration, to be prepared against six of the Clock the next morning, and to desire his Excellencies leave, that they might then meet to give their Consents, and subscribe their names to it; which his Excellency readily approved. And the next morning, the Addresses being prepared, was read to the Council of Officers, and Signed by them, and presented to his Excellency.

The Title was,

To his Excellency the Lord Generall Monck, Captain Generall of all the Armies and Forces in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and one of the Generalls at Sea.

The humble Address of the Officers of your Excellencies Army, in the Name of themselves and their Brethren.

The Officers Address to his Excellency, in Compliance with his Majesties Letter & Declaration.

“Although We cannot doubt of your Excellencies Confidence in our affections, and our Faithfulness to your Excellency, and that Discipline which, by your good and prudent Conduct, hath been exercised over us, whereby we are instructed to an intire Obedience to your Excellency, and that Authority which the Lord shall place over Us, which we hope we have manifested in our last Actions under your Excellency, against all persons whatsoever, in any wayes disturbing the Peace and Settlement of the Nations; although some of them have been our Brethren formerly engaged in the same Cause with Us. As also in our late Remonstrance and Address to your Excellency, wherein, as it becomes Us in Duty, We have solemnly declared to acquiesce in what the Lord shall bring forth from the Consultations of this present Parliament. Yet in regard your Excellency hath been pleased to communicate to Us, a Letter and Declaration from the Kings Majesty, full of gracious Expressions, We cannot but acknowledge, that the matter of it gives a great measure of quiet to our minds, and more then ordinary expectations of the enjoyment of much tranquillity and happiness under His Majesties Government. The free and generall Indempnity offered by his Majesty, with a liberty to tender Consciences, satisfaction of Arrears, his readiness to consent to a Confirmation of Sales, and other Grants and Purchases of Estates to all Persons now in possession of the same, is that of which we cannot doubt of the reall performance, being left by His Majesty to the Parliaments determination, so we believe it is the most probable way to bring the Nations to their desired Settlement. And we hope to evince to his Majesty, and all the World, That VVe, and all those that have been Engaged in the Parliaments Cause, are His Majesties most Loyall Subjects, and that your Excellency, and the Armies under your Command, have Complied with the Obligations, for which they were first raised, for the preservation of the true Protestant Religion, the Honour and Dignity of the King, the Priviledges of Parliament, the Liberty and Prosperity of the Subject, and the Fundamentall Lawes of the Land.

It is read by the Commons, and approved.

Commissary Charges appointed by the Generall, to wait upon his Majesty with this Address.

In the morning, at the first sitting of the Commons House, the Generall acquainted them, that he had Communicated his Majesties Letter, and the Declaration in it enclosed, to the Officers of the Army; and that thereupon they had presented an Address to him, which he desired they would be pleased to read, which was ordered, and after the reading, it was well approved of.

His Excellency then told them, He intended to prepare a Letter, to be sent to his Majesty, and did with their leave, purpose to send that Address to him, That His Majesty might thereby perceive, the Armies were at his devotion; and that he desiring to send it by Commissary Charges, who was as well a Member of their House, as an Officer of the Army, he requested their permission for him to go.

The House then Ordered, he should have leave to go from his Excellency to the King; and they gave five hundred Pounds to Sir John Greenville, to buy him a Jewel, as a Testimony of the Respects of the House to him.

After this, Alderman Robinson inform'd them, That the said Sir John Greenville, with the Lord Mordant, had presented a Letter from His Majesty, to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and they Comanded him to ask their leave to return an Answer to it: Which after the reading of it in the House, was granted; In that Letter also his Majesties Declaration was inclosed: The Letter itself was directed,

To

To our Trusty and Well-beloved, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and the Common-Council of our City of London.

CHARLES R.

Trusty and Well-beloved, We greet you well: In these great Revolutions of late, happened in that Our Kingdom, to the wonder and Amazement of all the World, there is none that we have looked upon with more Comfort, than the so frequent and publique manifestations of their affections to us in the City of London, which hath exceedingly raised Our Spirits, and which no doubt hath proceeded from the Spirit of God, and his extraordinary mercy to the Nation, which hath been encouraged by you, and your good Example, to assert that Government, under which it hath so many hundred years enjoyed as great felicity as any Nation in Europe, and to discountenance the Imaginations of those who would subject Our Subjects to a Government they have not yet desired, and to satisfy the Pride and Ambition of a few ill men, would introduce the most arbitrary and tyrannical Power that was ever yet heard of. How long we have all suffered under those and the like devices, all the World takes notice, to the no small reproach of the English Nation, which we hope is now providing for its own Security and Redemption, and will be no longer bewitched by those suggestions; How desirous we are to contribute to the obtaining the Peace and Happiness of our Subjects, without effusion of blood; and how far we are from desiring to recover what belongs to us by a Warre, if it can be otherwise done, will appear to you by the inclosed Declaration, which together with this our Letter, VVe have intrusted Our Right Trusty and Well-beloved Cousin, the Lord Viscount Mordant, and Our Trusty and well-beloved Servant, Sir John Greenville Knight, one of the Gentlemen of our Bed-Chamber, to deliver to you, to the end, that you, and all the rest of Our good Subjects of that Our City of London, (to whom we desire it should be published) may know how far we are from the desire of revenge, or that the Peace, Happiness, and Security of the Kingdom, should be raised upon any other Foundation than the affection and hearts of Our Subjects, and their own Consents. We have not the least doubt of your just sense of these our Considerations, or of your zeal to advance and promote the same good end, by disposing all men to meet us with the same affection and tenderness, in restoring the Fundamentall Lawes to that Reverence that is due to them, and upon the preservation whereof all Our happiness depends. And you will have no reason to doubt of enjoying your full share in that happiness, and of the improving it by Our particular Affection to you. It is very natural for all men to do all the good they can for their native Country, and to advance the Honour of it. And as we have that full affection for the Kingdom in generall, so we would not be thought to be without some extraordinary Kindness for Our Native City in that particular, which we shall manifest on all occasions, not only by renewing their Charter, and confirming all those Priviledges, which they have received from Our Predecessours, but by adding and granting any new Favour, which may advance the Trade, wealth, and Honour of that Our Native City, for which we will be so sollicitous, that we doubt not but that it will in due time receive some Benefit and Advantage in all those respects, even from Our own Observation and Experience abroad. And we are most confident, VVe shall never be disappointed in Our Expectation, of all possible Service from your Affections, and so VVe bid you farewell. Given at Our Court at Breda, the 22 Day of April, 1660. in the Twelfth Year of Our Reign.

We must not omit to commemorate the Cities joyful Reception of this Letter, and the Declaration in it, expressed by the Grateful Duty of the Common-Council, who immediately upon the Reading of them, Ordered Ten Thousand Pounds to be presented to his Majesty, a Thousand pounds to the Duke of York, and a Thousand pounds to the Duke of Gloucester; And that Alderman Langham, Alderman Reynolds, Alderman Brown, Alderman Thompson, Alderman Frerick, Alderman Hale, Alderman Adams, Alderman Bateman, Alderman Robinson, Mr. Recorder Wild, Sir Nicholas Crisp, Mr. Vincent, Mr. Bidolph, Mr. Ford, Mr. Bloodworth, Sir James Bunsen, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. William Bateman, should from that City attend his Majesty with a Presentation of their most Dutiful Acknowledgements, for his Clemency and Goodness towards them. His Excellency took care, that the Address presented to him by the Officers, together with Copies of the Kings Letter, and Declaration, should be sent to all the Regiments and Garrisons in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Dunkirk, requiring all to return their Subscriptions to him, and the Names of Dissenters (if any were) But it appeared by the Returns made, that the Army was so well purged by the Remonstrance that went before, that all readily and dutifully comply'd with this.

House of Lords, and 12 of the Commons, sent to attend upon
his Majesty.

The Lords House nominated the Earles of Oxford, Warwick, and Middlesex, and the Lord Viscount Hereford, the Lord Brook, and the Lord Birkley, to attend his Majesty from that House; And the Commons appointed the Lord Fairfax, Lord Bruce, Lord Falkland, Lord Castle-ton, Lord Herbert of Worcester, Lord Mandeville, Sir Horatio Townshend, Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper, Sir George Booth, Sir John Holland, Sir Henry Cholmley, and Denzell Hollis Esq; to attend his Majesty from that House: who were Ordered to make the quickest Preparation they could for their Journey, to desire his Majesty to make a speedy Return to his Parliament, to the Exercise of his Kingly Office.

His Majesties Letter and Declaration to the Fleet, by the diligence of General Monague, had the same success there, as that in the Army, being Gracefully received by all the Commanders and Sea-men.

The Letter it self was in these Words:

CHARLES R.

His Majesties
Letter to the Officers of the Fleet.

TRUFFY and VVell-beloved, VVe greet you well: It is no small Comfort to Us, after so long and great Troubles and Miseries, which the whole Nation hath groaned under; and after so great Revolutions, which have still encreased those Miseries, to hear that the Fleet and Ships, which are the VValls of the Kingdoms, are put under the Command of two Persons so well disposed to, and concerned in the Peace and Happiness of the Kingdom, as we believe you to be; and that the Officers and Sea-men under your Command, are more inclined to return to their Duty to us, and put a period to these Distempers and Distractions, which have so impoverish'd and dishonour'd the Nation, than to widen the Breach and to raise their Fortunes by Rapine and Violence; VVhich gives us great encouragement and hope, that God Almighty will heal the VVounds, by the same Plaijter that made the Fleth Raw; that he will proceed in the same method, in pouring his Blessings upon us, which he was pleas'd to use when he began to assist us, and that the Manifestation of the good Affection of the Fleet and Sea-men towards us, and the Peace of the Nation, may be the Prologue to that Peace, which was first interrupted by the Mistake and Misunderstanding of their Predecessors, which would be such a Blessing upon us all, that VVe should not be less delighted with the manner than the matter of it: In this Hope and Confidence, VVe have sent the inclosed Declaration to You, by which you may discern, how much VVe are willing to contribute towards the obtaining the General and Publick Peace: In which, as no man can be more, or so much concern'd; so no man can be more solicitous for it. And VVe do earnestly desire you, that you will cause the said Declaration to be published, to all the Officers and Sea-men of the Fleet; to the end, that they may plainly discern, how much VVe have put it into their Power, to provide for the Peace and Happiness of the Nation, who have been always understood by them, to be the best and most proper Counsellours for those good Ends: And You are likewise further to Declare to them, That We have the same Gracious Purpose towards them, which we have express'd towards the Army at Land; and will be as ready to provide for the Payment of all Arrears due to them, and for rewarding them according to their several Merits, as we have express'd to the other; and We will always take so particular a Care of them, and their Condition, as shall manifest Our Kindness towards them. And so depending upon Gods Blessing, for insuring these good Resolutions into your and their Hearts, which are best for us all, VVe bid you farewell. Given at Our Court at Breda, this 14 Day of April, 1660, in the Twelfth Year of Our Reign.

Superscribed,

To Our Trusty and Well-beloved General Monck, and General Mountague, Generals at Sea: To be Communicated to the Fleet:

Charles on the Fifth Day of May began his Journey to his Majesty; and at his parting from the General, he gave him no other Instructions, but to give the King all manner of Assurances of his Fidelity to him; and his Resolution to improve all his Opportunities to his Service, desiring him not to misse anything to his Majesty, either for himself, or him, or any other in his Company; That his Majesty might see, that both he, and those so nearly concern'd with him in his Restauration, sought more the Publick Good of their Country, than their own private Honour or Profit: which he did faithfully observe at that time, and ever after. And three days after the Lords and Commons having agreed upon a Proclamation to that purpose, his Majesty was Proclaim'd with great Solemnity, in the Cities of London and Westminster, the Lords and Commons, and the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London being present; the manner was as followeth:

A The Lords came out of their House into the Painted-Chamber, where they continued till they were placed in Order; the Earl of Arundel first, then the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Oxford, &c. Thusthey walked out along with the Heralds before them, through the Court of Requests, and Westminster-Hall, to the Pallace, where they staid before the Hall Gate, whilst Mr. Bish one of the Heralds, and Mr. Ryly that officiated as King at Arms, with a loud Voice, Proclaimed the King in these words:

Although it can no way be doubted, but that His Majesties Right and Title to His Crown and Kingdoms, is, and was every way compleated by the Death of His most Royal Father of Glorious Memory, without the Ceremony or Solemnity of a Proclamation: Yet since Proclamations in such Cases have always been used, to the end, that all good Subjects might, upon this occasion, testify their Duty and Respect; And since the Armed Violence, and other the Calamities of many Years last past, have hitherto deprived us of any such Opportunity, wherein we might express our Loyalty and Allegiance to His Majesty; VVe therefore the Lords and Commons now Assembled in Parliament, together with the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council of the City of London, and other Free-men of this Kingdom now present, do, according to Our Duty and Allegiance, heartily, joyfully, and unanimously, acknowledge and Proclaim, That upon the Decease of Our late Sovereign Lord King Charles, the Imperiall Crown of the Realm of England, and of all the Kingdoms, Dominions, and Rights, belonging to the same, did by inherent Birth-Right, and lawful and undoubted Succession, descend and come to his most Excellent Majesty CHARLES the Second, as being Lineally, Justly, and Lawfully next Heir of the Royal Blood of this Realm; And that by the Goodness and Providence of Almighty GOD, He is of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, the most Potent, Mighty, and Undoubted King: And therunto we most humbly and faithfully do submit, and oblige Our Selves, our Heirs and Posterities.

D The Proclamation being ended, the Lords and Commons took their Coaches, and proceeded in this Order; First, the Head-Bayliff of Westminster, and his Servants, did ride along with White-Staffes to prepare the Way; Then followed a gallant Troop of the Officers of the Army, and other Gentlemen, with Trumpets before them; Then the Life-Guard, commanded by Captain Philip Howard, very stately mounted, and richly Cloath'd; after them a Claif of Trumpets, and three Heralds; Then a Herald between the Serjeant to the Commons, and the Mace of the Council: Next, Ryly King at Arms, in a Rich Coat of the Kings Arms, betwixt Serjeant Norfolk, and Serjeant Middleton; after whom came the Usher of the Black-Rod, and Mr. Bish: These, thus Ushering the Way, the Earl of Manchester followed in his Coach and Six Horses, the Speaker of the House of Commons in his, then his Excellency General Monck in his; after which followed both Houses of Parliament in Coaches, and after them a Troop of Horse; in this manner they came to White-Hall, where they Proclaimed his Majesty a second time; and then proceeded to Temple-Bar, Where the Gates being shut, The King at Arms, with Trumpets before him, knuckled, and demanded Entrance: The Lord Mayor appointed some to ask, Who it was that knock'd? The King at Arms Replyd, That if they would open the Wicket, and let the Lord Mayor come thither, he would to him deliver his Message: The Lord Mayor came then on Horse-back richly habited, in a Crimson-Velvet Gown, to the Gate, and then the Trumpets sounded, and after Silence being made, Alderman Bateman, by Order of the Lord Mayor, demanded of the Herald, Who he was, and what was his Message? To which he answer'd, with his Hat on, We are the Heralds at Arms, appointed and commanded by the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, to demand Entrance into the Famous City of London, to Proclaim Charles the Second King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, and we expect your speedy Answer to this Demand. To which, after a little Consultation amongst themselves, Alderman Bateman Answer'd, Their Message was accepted, and the Gates should be immediately opened; which was done accordingly.

The King at Arms entered first, Trumpets sounding before him, and was joyfully received by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, and all the Officers of the City Militia gallantly accoutred, both sides of the Streets were lin'd by the Trained-Bands of London, from Temple-Bar to the Old-Exchange, who stood all with their Swords drawn; The City-Troop march'd next to the Life-Guard, then the Lord Mayor and Aldermen; after whom the Heralds, and the rest, as before: When they came to Chancery-Lane End, they proclaim'd his Majesty a third time: And from thence they march'd to Cheap-side, where he was proclaim'd a fourth time; and from thence to the Old-Exchange, where he was again Proclaim'd. The Shouts and Acclamations of the People, at this gallant and orderly Procession, were very great, and their Demonstrations of Joy, at the several Stations, when the Ceremony of Proclaiming was performing, not to be express'd; sometimes they lookt upwards, and then presently cast their Eyes towards the General, as if they intended at one time to pay a Tribute of Thankfulness to Heaven, and his Excellency, who had done an Action so Glorious and Transcendent, that this present Age cannot enough admire, and our Posterity will with difficulty believe; and then again they cry'd out, God Save King Charles the Second; as if they acknowledged that Dayes Joy, as a Recompence sufficient for all their Pressures and Grievances; so excellent a Tutor is the want of that, which long Fruition makes us imperfectly understand.

The Guns from the Tower were all shot off, and all the Streets that Evening were fill'd with Bone-fires, and the Air with the Sound of Ringing of Bells; and all seem'd too little, to celebrate the content and exultation of the People, at that Dayes Solemnity.

Commissary Clarges made such speed in his Journey to his Majesty, That on Tuesday the 8th of May, in the Morning, which was the Day after the happy making of this Proclamation, he arrived at Bergen-op-Zone in Holland, half a Dayes Journey from Breda; There the Governour gave him a very Honourable Reception, and accommodated him with his Coach and six Horses to Breda; and a League before he came to the Town, the Lord Gerrard met him with Two Coaches and Six Horses, and accompanied him to his Majesty, who received him with most Gracious Expressions of Satisfaction, as well that he was the first authorized Messenger, that came to him with the Newses of the indee Submission of his Kingdoms and Army to his Obedience: As for his Relation to that most Renowned General, from whose prudent Conduct and Courage, all that Happiness was derived to his Majesty, and his People.

He presented to his Majesty, a Letter from the General, in Answer to his Majesties, sent before to him; and in it was inclosed the Address of the Officers of the Army.

May it please your Majesty,

The General's Letter to his Majesty.

THE Parliament being Sitting at my receipt of your Majesties gracious Letter to me, I thought my self obliged in Duty to present it to the House of Commons, whose Sence of it, and of that other your Majestie was pleased to send to them by Sir John Greenwill, I doubt not but your Majestie will receive an account of by some of their own Members; I have also Communicated your Majesties Letter and Declaration to as many of the Chief Officers of the Army as were present in or about London, who resented your Majesties Clemency and Grace to them with very great Duty and Affection, as your Majestie may perceive in the inclosed Address, which within few hours after their Convention, they deliver'd to me.

By all which Circumstances, I hope I may assure your Majestie, That as the Army hath been very Instrumentall in their Endeavours to further the Settlement, Peace and Prosperity of your Majesties Kingdoms and Dominions; So nothing will be dearer to them and me, than to be found in our Generations pursuing those good Ends, which may render us serviceable and acceptable to our Country, to give unto Caesar the things that are Caesars, and to God the things which are Gods.

May the 5th.

May it please your Majesty;

Your Majesties most humble and Obedient Servant and Subject,

George Monck.

This Letter was dictated by his Excellencie in the presence of many Officers of the Army; but he writ another short Letter with his own hand: Wherein he acquainted his Majesty, That he chose to send Mr. Clarges to him, because he was the only Person he trusted in the nearest Concernments and Consultations for his Restauration, as one to whom he desired his Majesty to give Credit to what he should say on that behalf.

After the reading of these Letters, and the Address inclosed in the former of them, His Majesty Knighted him, and by many kind expressions demonstrated his sence of his Merit and Service to him; and after he had been about an hour with his Majesty, he had his permission to attend his Royall Highness the Duke of York and the Duke of Gloucester, who received him with that affability which was inherent in them, and which became the most accomplished and most Generous Princes in the World. From them he waited on the Princess of Orange, who expressed great Content at his Relation of the News he brought; and at his parting from her, she gave order he should with his whole Retinue be entertained at her Charge whilest he staid in Breda, and had a Coach and Six Horses of her Highnesses, with Equipage suitable, to wait on him when he should give order for it. He went then to Visit the Lord Chancellor, and from him the Marquess of Ormond, as those deservedly (next the Royall Family) in greatest Credit with his Majesty; both of them receiving him with that respect as the import and relation of his Message and Person did deserve.

The Two Houses of Parliament having perfected the Instructions for their Commissioners, and the Letter to his Majesty, they were delivered to them, and they began their Journey towards the Hague (at which place his Majesty intended to meet them) on the 11th of May, the time prefix'd in the Instructions for their Journey.

Instructions for Anthony Earl of Oxford, Charles Earl of Warwick, Lionell Earl of Middlesex, Lyncoller Viscount Hereford, George Lord Berkley, Robert Lord Brook, The Lord Herbert, the Lord Mandivell, the Lord Bruce, the Lord Castletowne, the Lord Falkland, the Lord Fairfax, Sir Horatio Townsend, Sir John Holland, Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper, Sir George Booth, Sir Henry Cholmley, and Denzill Hollis, Esquire.

The Instructions were thus, (Viz.)

You are to begin your Journey towards his Majesty on Friday next, and make a speedy repair to such place where his Majesty shall be, and humbly to present the Letters wherewith you are respectively intrusted by both Houses of Parliament.

You are to acquaint his Majesty with what great Joy and Acclamation he was Proclaimed in and about the Cities of London and Westminster, upon the Eighth day of May Instant, and present the Proclamation itself to his Majesty, and to acquaint him with the Orders of both Houses to have the same Proclaimed throughout the Kingdoms of England and Ireland, and the Dominion of Wales, and the Town of Berwick upon Tweed.

And that both Houses have Ordered;

That all and every the Ministers throughout the Kingdoms of England and Ireland be enjoyned in their Publique Prayers to pray for his Most Excellent Majesty, and for the most Illustrious Prince James Duke of York, and the rest of the Royall Progeny. And also have Ordered, That the assumed Arms of the late pretended Common-wealth, where ever they are standing, be taken down, and that his Majesties Arms be set up instead thereof: And you are to Communicate to his Majesty the Resolution of both Houses relating to these Instructions.

You are to acquaint his Majesty with the earnest Desire of both Houses, that his Majesty will be pleased to make a speedy Return to his Parliament, and to the Exercise of his Kingly Office; and that in order thereunto, both Houses have given Direction to General Mountague one of the Generalls at Sea, and other Officers of the Fleet, to observe such Commands as his Majesty shall please to give him or them for disposall of the Fleet in order to his Majesties Return; And you are to Communicate to his Majesty the Resolution of both Houses relating to this Instruction.

John Brown, Cl. Parl.

The House of Commons added one more Instruction to the Commissioners; which was, To beseech his Majesty, that the Parliament may know where he purposeth to take Shipping, and to Land at his coming over, that Preparation may be made for his Reception; and which of his Majesties Houses he intendeth to make use of at his first coming to London; And whether he will come all the way by Land after he comes on Shore; or whether he will please to come by Water from Graves-End to London? And that his Majesty will declare in what manner he is pleased to be Received.

All these Commissioners in three dayes after their departure from London, arrived at the Hague; And on Wednesday the Sixteenth of May, our stile, they had their severall Audiences by his Majesty, who received them all with a sweet and serene Countenance, and a Heart full of Content and good Inclinations towards them; and all the City Commissioners were Knighted by him. He gave that Evening his Dispatch to Sir Thomas Clarges, and Commanded him to acquaint the Generall, He intended to take Shipping at the Bay of Scheveling on Monday after, and to Slay to Dover and Land there; from whence he would immediately go to Canterbury, and stay there some time to determine of the manner of his Entrance into London. The Fleet was some dayes before in pursuance of the Orders of both Houses in the said Bay.

On Thursday early in the Morning, Sir Thomas Clarges attempted by Boat from Scheveling, to get on Board the Admirall, but the Weather was so stormy he could not do it, till towards the Evening; And then General Mountague Ordered the Norwich Frigate for his Transportation: The Winds were so contrary, and the Weather so stormy, that the Pilot could not make any Land in England till Monday Morning, at which time he Landed at Alborough in Suffolk, and immediately from thence sent an Expreß to the Generall, and the Speaker of the House of Commons, with intimation of his Majesties Resolutions: Whereupon his Excellency with a great and gallant Company of the Chiefest of the Nobility and Gentry of England, set forward from London the 22th of May; and for the more conveniency of Quartering so numerous a Company, he advis'd them to divide themselves into Troops according to the severall Counties, and the interest of the Noblemen present.

At Rochester Sir Thomas Clarges met the Generall, and presented unto him his Majesties Letter, with Royall and most endeav'd assurances of Esteem from the Best of Kings, to the Wor-thiest and most deserving of Subjects. The Letter was dated the 22th of May. Directed,

To Our Trusty and Well-beloved Generall Monck, To be Communicated to the Officers of the Army.

CHARLES R.

“Trusty and Well-beloved, We Greet you well. You will easily believe that your Letter of the Fifth of this Moneth, by Sir Thomas Clarges, was very Welcome to Us: And that as We must alwaies acknowledg the infinite Mercy of God Almighty in disposing the Hearts of the Army in such an intire obedience to you, for the promoting and carrying on Our Service, and the Peace of the Kingdom; So We can never be without a Just Esteem of such a great and well Disciplin'd Army, upon which the Eyes of the World are so much fixed. We must desire you to return Our very hearty Thanks to Officers and Souldiers for their affection and obedience to Us; and to assure them from Us, That we shall alwaies have an intire Confidence in them, and ever acknowledg them to be the great Instruments of Restoring Us, and Peace, and Happiness, and Security to Us all: And therefore they may not only with all imaginable Confidence assure themselves, that We will punctually perform whatever We have promised to them in Our Declaration or Letter, but that We will take them into Our particular Care and Protection. And if the Licence and distemper of the time shall so far transport any men, as to presume upon memory of former Animosities, and of what is past, to use any reproaches towards them, We will look upon such persons as disturbers of the Peace and Security of the Kingdom, and shall cause them to be prosecuted accordingly. And towards this Settlement and Composure, and for the prevention of many inconveniencies which may fall out, We think nothing so necessary as Our presence with you, by which (in a very short time) every Member of the Army, who shall faithfully adhere to you in advancement of the Publique Peace, shall with the blessing of God, find himself secured and provided, for to his satisfaction. And longing for that Blessed time, We bid you heartily farewell.

His Excellencie being in his Journey, had not opportunity to communicate this Letter to any more of his Officers than those that were present with him.

But the Fame of his Majesties transcendent Vertues had prevented this written discovery of them, and made indelible impressions of duty and affection in the Army.

The King intended to have taken shipping on Monday, but the Crossness of the Winds forc'd him a little to defer it. His Royall Highness the Duke of York went on Monday and Tuesday to the Fleet, to take Charge thereof as Lord High Admirall: And on Wednesday the 23. his Sacred Majestie, the Queen of Bohemia, the Prince of Orange, the Dukes of York and Gloucester, and the Prince of Orange, went on board the Naseby, (which his Majestie now named: the Royall Charles) where after a Re-past, The Queen of Bohemia, the Prince of Orange, and the Prince of Orange her Sonne, took leave of his Majestie, and then the Fleet set sayle for England: His Royall Highness the Duke of York came in the London; and the Duke of Gloucester in the Swiftsure, now called the James.

During the time his Majestie had remain'd at the Hague, and all the way thither from Breda, the States of Holland entertain'd him with great Magnificence; and at his departure they presented him with a rich Bed, of the Value of Seven Thousand pounds Sterling; and as much Linen as was valued at a Thousand pounds.

On Friday about three of the Clock in the Morning, The Fleet was in sight of Dover, whereupon an Express was sent to the Generall (then newly come to Canterbury) to haste to Dover; which he presently did, and about Ten of the Clock came thither.

His Excellencie before he came from Canterbury, advising with the Earl of Lindsey, and some of the other Noble-men that accompanied him, about the conveniency of his Majesties stay at Dover, was informed that he could have no accommodation there for a stay of his Train, and and those that came to wait on him, and therefore he resolv'd humbly to move him, at his Landing, to proceed on directly to Canterbury.

About One in the Afternoon, his Majesty Land'd at the Beech near Dover-Heath, with the Duke of York, and the Duke of Gloucester, and many Noble-men and Gentlemen. All that were present, put themselves into a Posture, to see the Meeting of the King and the General: The Admirers of Majesty, were Jealous on his Majesties Behalf, of too low Condescension; and the Lovers of Duty fearful on the other Side, of an Ostentation of Merit: But such a humble Prostration was made by the General, and so generous a Reception by his Majesty, kissing and embracing him, that all Parties were satisfied, to admiration. And his Excellency from that time received to great an Impression of the marvellous Goodness of his Majesty, that he resolv'd what before he had perform'd, out of bounden Duty to his Liege-Lord, should be for ever continued with the same observance, out of Loyal Affections to his Gracious Sovereign.

His Majesty walked from the Water-side, towards the Town, with the General, a Canopy being carried over his Head, and a Chair of State by him; and upon his Excellencies Motion, for his going to Canterbury, for the Reasons before expressed, he halted to his Coach; in his Passage to which he was met by the Mayor and Aldermen of the Town, with Mr. Reading their Minister, who presented his Majesty with a large Bible, with Gold Clasp: At one end of the Coach next the King, sat the Duke of York, and at the other the Duke of Gloucester, and the General; and the Duke of Buckingham sat in the Boot. About two miles from Dover, his Majesty took Horse, his Royal Brothers rode on his Right Hand, and the General on his Left: After whom the Duke of Buckingham, and several other Noblemen and Gentlemen follow'd in gallant Equipage.

At his Majesties Entrance into Canterbury, he was met by the Mayor and Aldermen, and Mr. Lovelace the Recorder, who made an eloquent Speech to him; the Mayor also presented him with a Tankard of Massie Gold, and then conducted him to the Palace, where he remained till Monday.

The next Day after his Arrival at Canterbury, his Majesty Dignified his Excellency with the Honour of the Garter; he was brought up to the King by the Earl of Winchelsea, and the Lord Mordaunt, who were both Knighted with him; and his Royal Highness the Duke of York, and the Duke of Gloucester, in great Testimony of Respect to him, assisted at the Ceremony, and put on the Garter, and the George; Mr. Morrice was also Knighted, and for the Prudence and Fidelity he manifested, in Contributing to his Majesties Restauration, Declared Secretary of State; and that Evening his Majesty sent the General a Warrant to be Master of his Horse.

His Majesty likewise at Canterbury, conferr'd the Honour of Knighthood on Major-Generall Masey, Alderman Robinson, Mr. Daniel Harvey, Mr. Thomas Stenkley, Collonel Roffier, Captain Philip Howard, and Mr. Robert Pafson: Moreover, his Excellency the Earl of Southampton, and Mr. Secretary Morrice, were Sworn of the Privy-Council.

On Monday following, his Majesty came into Rochester, where, after he had a little refreshed himself, he went to Chatham, to see the Royal Sovereign, and returned that Night to Collonel Gibbons his House, where he lay that Night, and was by the Collonel presented with a most Dutiful and Loyal Address from him and his Regiment, which was then Quartered in Rochester.

From thence his Majesty march'd to Black-Heath, where the Army was drawn up, and was much pleas'd with the sight of it; for indeed they seem'd all men of one age, and one mind, and were for their number, as gallant Troops as were to be seen in the World.

Collonel Knight there most humbly presented to his Majesty a Writing, which contained the most humble and obedient Declaration of the Armes joy, for the Honour of his Majesties presence amongst them; wherein after many dutiful expressions of exalted gladness for his Majesties Restauration, they besought, That his Majesty would have now his great Council about him, who had already given proof of their Loyalty and Wisdom both to his Majesty and his People. They also declared, That as they had not been altogether useless in the Restauration of his Sacred Majesty, to his Crown and Kingdoms, and his People to their just Rights thereby; so they should for the future cheerfully sacrifice their lives, or whatsoever could be more dear to them, in the service of his Majesty, against all opposers whatsoever, and by a ready Obedience to his Majesties Commands, express themselves better than in Words.

When his Majesty came to St. George his Fields, the Lord Major and Aldermen humbly on their knees Reverenc'd him; and the Lord Major presented his Sword, which his Majesty gave back to him; and after a little Collation in a Tent provided by the Lord Major, his Majesty went towards White-Hall in this manner:

All the Streets were richly adorn'd with Tapistry, and from London-Bridge to White-Hall, and as far as Temple-Barre, were equally ranked in good order, the Trained-Band-Forces on the one side of the Streets, and the severall Companies in their Liveries on the other: From Temple-Barre to White-Hall, the Trained-Bands of Westminster, and the parts adjacent on one side, and some Companies of the Army on the other, to whom was join'd a gallant Company of the late Kings Officers, Commanded by Sir John Stowell.

The Procession was led by Major Generall Brown, who had a Troop of three-hundred, all in Cloth of Silver Doublets; then followed twelve hundred in Velvet-Coats, with Foot-men and Liversies veries attending them in Purple. Then another Troop led by Alderman Robinson, in Buff Coats, A with Cloth of Silver sleeves, and very rich Green Scarfs; and after these, a Troop of about a hundred and fifty with Blew Liveries, laced with Silver Lace, with six Trumpeters, and seven Footmen in Sea-Green and Silver. Then a Troop of two hundred and twenty, with thirty Footmen in Gray and Silver Liveries, and four Trumpeters richly Cloathed. Then another Troop of one hundred and five, with Gray Liveries, and six Trumpeters; and another of twenty with five Trumpeters: And then three Troops more, two of three hundred, and one of one hundred, all richly habited, and bravely Mounted. After these came two Trumpeters with his Majesties Arms; the Sheriffs men in red Cloaks richly Laced with Silver Lace, to the number of fourscore, with half Pikes in their hands: then followed six hundred of the several Companies of London on Horseback, in black Velvet Coats, with Gold Chains, each Company having Footmen in Liveries attending.

After these came a Kettle-Drum, five Trumpets, and three Streamers, and many rich red Liveries with Silver Lace. After these twelve Ministers, and then another Kettle-Drum, and four Trumpeters, and His Majesties Life-Guard of Horse, Commanded by the Lord Gerard; Then three Trumpets in rich Coats, and Satin Doublets, and the City-Marshal, with eight Footmen in French Green, trim'd with Crimson and White; the City Waits, and all the City Officers in order: Then the two Sheriffs, and all the Aldermen of London in Scarlet Gowns, and rich Trappings, with Footmen in Liveries, Red Coats Laced with Silver, and Cloth of Gold and Silver. The Herald and Maces in rich Coats. Then the Lord Mayor carrying the Sword bare, and next to him the Duke of Buckingham and the Generals, and then the Kings Majesty betwixt the Dukes of Tork and Gloucester: Then followed a Troop of Horse with white Colours, and after them the Generals Life-Guard, led by Sir Philip Howard. Then five Regiments of the Army-Horse, led by Colonel Knight: And after them, two Troops of Noblemen and Gentlemen.

Thus was his Majesty Conduced to his Royall Palace at White-Hall, on the nine and twentieth day of May, His Birth-day, and with Him, Peace and Happiness returned to His Kingdoms and People, which all good men desire may be for ever continued to them, under the happy Government of Him and His Posterity.

When the Lord Mayor had taken leave of him, he went to the Lords, where he was entertained with a Grave but Eloquent Speech of the Earl of Manchester, and from thence to the Banqueting-House, where the whole House of Commons attending him, the Speaker in their Names D expressed the Joyfull Sense they all had, to behold his Majesty returned in Safety, and thereby an end was put to that Tyranny and Slavery his good People had endured.

The King told them, He was so disorder'd by his Journey, and with the noise still sounding in his Ears, (which nevertheless he confess'd was pleasing to him, because it expressed the Affections of his People) that he was thereby unfit to make such a Reply as he desired: But added, That he took no greater Satisfaction to himself in this his Change, than that he found his Heart really set to endeavour by all means the restoring of these Nations to their Freedom and Happiness; which he hoped by the Advice of his Parliament E to effect. And that next to the Honour of God, from whom he chiefly owned the Restoration to his Crown, he would study the Welfare of his People; and not only be a true Defender of the Faith, but a just Assessor of the Laws and Liberties of his Subjects.

After the conclusion of these Ceremonies, he intended to go to Westminster-Abbey to offer up a Thanksgiving to God for all his Deliverances and Mercies towards him; but by the Weariness he had contracted through the Toil (however grateful) of that Dayes Action, he was diverted from his intention of going thither, yet would he not for any consideration be withheld from his Devotion, and his Oblations of Thanks to God, which at that time he made in his Presence-Chamber, because his Chappell was not yet prepared for his Reception.

The next day the Dukes of Tork and Gloucester took their Places in the House of Peers, as did a while after several other Peers, who were made by his Majesty beyond the Seas, and Summoned by Writ, (viz.) Henry Jermin Earl of Saint Albans, and Baron of Saint Edmunds-Bury; Henry Willmot Earl of Rochester, Baron Willmot of Alderbury; and Viscount William of Shilton in Ireland; John Adams, Viscount Adams of Adams; Sir Walter Langdale, Baron Langdale of Holmes; Charles Croft, Baron Croft; Sir John Barkley, Baron Barkley; Charles Kirkcoppin, Baron Wharton of Wharton.

In the first place after his Majesties Arrival, were appointed the chief Officers of State, and of his Majesties Household, his Highness the Duke of Tork was Invested with the Office of Lord High-Admirall of England, and Lord-Warden of the Cinque-Ports. The Lord General Monck G (not long after created Duke of Albmarle) was continued Captain General of all the Forces of the Three Kingdoms, and made Master of the Horse to his Majesty. Sir Edward Hale (afterwards Earl of Clarendon) was constituted Lord High-Chancellor of England: The Earl of Southampton Lord High-Treasurer of England: Sir Edward Nicholas, and Sir William Mortimer Chief Secretaries of State: The Marquess of Ormond was appointed Lord Steward, and the Earl of Manchester, Lord Chamberlain of his Majesties Household: Sir Frederick Carteret, Lord

John Nicholas Esq; Eldest Son to the Secretary of State; And Sir George Lane, Secretary to the Marquess of Ormond.

In the next place, (speciall Care was taken for the committing of all Military Offices of highest Trust, as well as the Civil already mention'd, into the hands of such Persons as were judg'd most faithful to the Kings Service; so that the Governments of all the most Important Castles, Fortresses, and Islands, and the first Commands of the severall Regiments of the Army, were by the Lord General confer'd upon such Lords and other Persons of Honour as the King was pleas'd to recommend unto him to that Effect, untill such time as the Army could conveniently be disbanded. Likewise, for the farther settling of the Militia of the Nation, there were of the Chief Nobility of the Land continued Lord-Lieutenants of the severall Counties, each having under them, as Deputy-Lieutenants, such Gentlemen of the same Counties as had most eminently shewn their affections to his Majesty.

The House of Commons in the mean time, applied themselves to the perfecting of an Act of General Pardon, which was read Twice in the House the One and Thirtieth of this Moneth, thereby complying with that great Clemency and Indulgence of his Majesty to his People, expressed in his most Gracious Letter from Breda. They had in the first Proposition of this Act, designed to except from Pardon severall of the Judges of the late King, and others instrumental in the perpetration of that horrid Treason; of which they had in Custody Eight persons, (viz.) Harrison, Carew, Clement, and Jones, of the Judges; Cook who was the Professor, Hacker Captain of the Holberdeers, and Colonel Axtell; also Hugh Peters the Minister, a virulent incendiary in the Action, who for a while had been culling up and down in secret, was at length taken in Southwark. There were others that had been seduced into that Treason, (viz.) Coll. Richard Ingoldsby, Francis Lassels, and John Hutchinson; but so much was said in the House in their favours, that they were not made culpable with the rest. As for Ingoldsby, it was made to appear, that Oliver Cromwell, without his consent, set his hand and seal to the Warrant for Execution of the King: Besides that, by many Actions of his Loyalty since, and his Engagement in Sir George Booth's business, and against Lambert, (as is before related) he had given eminent testimony of his abhorrence of so foul a Crime. Lassels had never been in the High Court of Justice, and but once at any meeting with them, and at that time he declared his dissent to their proceedings. And Hutchinson had been a very early Convert, and appeared much against that execrable Oath of Abjuration of the King's Person and Posterity, in that part of the Parliament which sat at the time of Generall Monck's March into London.

The King comes to the Parliament, and gives his Royal Assent to several Bills.

This Act of General Pardon had so many particulars in it of different nature, that it took up very much time; but nevertheless, the Parliament omitted not to perfect some necessary Lawes for the safety of the Government. On the second of June, the Parliament having the day before intimated to the King, that they had prepared Three Bills for him, his Majesty came to the House of Lords, and having sent to the House of Commons to attend him, there gave his Royal Assent to them; (viz.) To an ACT for Confirmation of an Ordinance made by the Lords and Commons in his absence, for the raising of Seventy Thousand Pounds a Month for Three Months. An ACT for Confirmation of the present Parliament. And, An ACT for the Continuance of Proceedings in Judicial Proceedings. Which last, was for avoiding of Discontinuances in the Courts of Westminster, because the first four Returns of Easter-Term could not be conveniently kept, and to prevent the abatement of Writs that were not issued in the Kings Name before his Return to the exercise of Government.

His Majesty also prest them (as well by his particular Charge, as by the Lord Chancellor's Speech) to hasten their passing of the Bill of Indemnity, which (as well as all other Bills of Publick Concernment) he was ready to Sign; whereupon this Bill was from thenceforth the grand Business of both Houses untill it was finished: Nor could it be finished till after some considerable time, and many large and serious Consultations. In the mean time, the Two Houses themselves desired to lay hold upon this Amnestie in the Name of the whole Nobility and Commonalty of the Nation: which being easily granted by the King, the Ceremony was performed in the Banqueting-House, where they waited upon his Majesty to that end.

About this time came forth a Proclamation, whereby it was declared, That all such of the late Kings Judges as did not render themselves, should be Excepted out of the General Pardon: And thereupon Adrian Scroop, and Nineteen others of them conceal'd in several parts, presented themselves to the Speaker of the House of Commons, and were committed to Custody. The Lord Grey of Groby, and Four and twenty more were dead; and Thomas Scott, and Nineteen others escaped beyond the Seas, but were attainted by Act of Parliament, as shall be hereafter expressed; And Scot was, shortly after his Escape, taken at Brussels, and by the diligence of the Kings Agent there sent into England, and sent to the Tower.

On the 4th of June, the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance to the King were rendered to all the Members of both Houses of Parliament, with the Kings Servants and Officers of his Household, by the Lord Steward, and the Lord Chamberlain: And by Order of Parliament of the 4th of the same Month, the Lord Generall was desired to take an effectual Care that the same Oaths should be administered to all the Officers and Souldiers of the Armies under his Command; And the Lord Chancellor to that end was also desired to Issue forth Commissions under the Great Seal of England, to such persons as the Lord Generall should nominate and appoint, for administering the said Oaths to the Officers and Souldiers accordingly. This Order was with all imaginable Care executed both by the Generall and the Chancellor: And to settle the Army so as it might be most serviceable to his Majesty, he removed several Colonels and other Officers, and placed divers of the Loyal Nobility and Gentry in their places.

As the generality of the people had a little before, upon the conclusion of his Majesties Admission into his Dominions, and his preparation to come over, given great demonstrations of their affection and Loyalty to him, by their universal alacrity in proclaiming him throughout the Three Nations; So likewise, immediately after he was come, they were no less forward to manifest their Duty and Allegiance by Congratulatory Addresses from all parts of the Kingdom, (the like duty being perform'd by several of the Nobility and Gentry both of Scotland and Ireland,) also those Towns and Corporations that had bought out their several Fee-Farm Rents belonging formerly to the Crown, and by the late Commonwealth alienated from it, sent their Deputies to his Majesty, to make a voluntary Surrender of them back again unto him. Others presented him with Sums of Gold and other Gifts according to their abilities: But the City of London, as being the first, the richest and most Honourable, and the Seat of Kings for many Ages, judg'd themselves oblig'd in point of Duty and Reputation, to exceed all the rest in the glory of their performances toward their Sovereign; and therefore to the splendour of their former preparations at his first Reception and Triumphall Entrada, they added the Cost of a most Magnificent Entertainment at Guild-Hall, (which was for that very purpose richly beautified and adorn'd) to which the King, the two Princes his Brothers, the Lords of the Privy Council, the Two Houses of Parliament, and the Chief Officers of State being solemnly Invited, were, on Thursday the 5th of July, conducted thither in very great Pomp by the Lord Mayor and the Grantees of the City, where they were Treated in a royall manner with the choicest of delicacies, with excellent Musick, and what ever else could be thought on of delightfull for so illustrious an Assembly.

Nor was his Majesty wanting on the other side to give such publick Testimonies of his Vertue and Prudence, as might render him deservedly glorious in the Esteem of all sober and moderate persons, and that by severall wholesome Edicts, especially by that Seasonable Proclamation which he publish'd, one of the first things he did after his Arrivall, for the discourtenancing and punishing of Debauchery, Profaneness, and all manner of Vice: Dated the 31 of May, 1660.

The King fate very frequently in Council about the great Affairs of Government; and upon Information that many Irish Rebels had in unusual Numbers resorted from beyond the Seas to England and Ireland, and were so insolent as to dispossess many Souldiers, and Adventurers in Ireland,

The Kings Proclamation concerning the Irish Rebels.

A Ireland, who had possession of their forfeited Estates: at the humble Request of the Parliament, the King published a Proclamation, Commanding all Irish Rebels (such only excepted as have by Articles had the Liberty of residing in his Majesties Dominions, and have not forfeited the same), that still stay in, or shall resort to, England or Ireland, to be apprehended and proceeded against as Rebels and Traytors: And that the Adventurers and Souldiers should not be disturbed in their Possessions, untill the King by Advice of Parliament shall take further Order, or they be Legally Evicted. And requiring all Officers both Civill and Military, to see the said Proclamation put in Execution.

But notwithstanding his Majesties great Care and Zeal to Settle and Compose all publique Differences, many ill-affected people in Pamphlets aspersed his Actions, maliciously endeavouring to insinuate, that he intended nothing less than the performance of his Promises from Breda; Which made him send a Message to the House of Commons by Sir William Morrice, to quicken their Debates about the Act of General Pardon and Indemnity, as that which would best quiet the Minds of his Subjects.

He told them, He had too ample a manifestation of their Affections and Duty towards him, (the good Effects of which was notoriou to the World) to make the least doubt of the continuance and improvement thereof; or in the least degree to dislike what they had done, or to Complain of what they had left undone: And that he knew well the weight of those Affairs which depended upon their Counsells, and the time that must unavoidably be spent, where there must be naturally difference of Opinions and Judgments amongst those whose desires of the Publique Peace and Safety were the same: And that neither he nor they must be over-much troubled, if they found their good Intention and unwearied pains, taken to reduce those good Intentions into reall Acts for the Quiet and Security of the Nation, misrepresented, and mis-interpreted, by those who are in truth assisted to see the publike Distractions, by Gods Blessing, so near an end; and by others upon whose Weakness, Fears and Jealousies, the activity and cunning of those ill men hath had too great an Influence.

That how wonderful and miraculous soever the great harmony of affections between him and his Subjects is, (it being so visible to the World, that there scarce appears the view of any Cloud to overshadow or disturb it) yet it is not to be thought that God Almighty had wrought the Miracle to that degree, that a Nation so miraculously divided for so many Years, would be so soon and irreversibly united in their Affections and Endeavours as were to be wished; but that the Evil Consciences of many continued so awake for mischief; they would not be willing to take rest themselves, or suffer others to take it: And that they all had too sad Experience of the unhappy Effects of Fears and Jealousies, how groundless and unreasonable soever, not to think it very necessary to apply all timely and proper Remedies to those Displeasures, and to prevent the Inconveniencies and Mischiefs which so naturally flow from thence: That he well foresaw, That the great violation which the Laws of the Land had for so many years sustained, had fill'd the hearts of the People with a terrible apprehension of insecurity to themselves, if all they had said and done should be liable to be examined and punished by those Laws which had been so violated: And that nothing could establish the Security of King and People, but a full Provision that the returning to the reverence and obedience of the Law (which is good for all) should not turn to the ruine of any who were willing and fit to receive that Protection hereafter from the Law, and to pay that Subjection to it, which were just and necessary; and therefore, he said, he made a free Offer of a General Pardon in such a manner as was expressed in his Declaration; and how ready and desirous he was to make good the same, appeared by his Proclamation Issued out upon and according to their desire: However, it was evident, that all he had offered or did offer, did not enough compose the Minds of his People; Nor in their Opinions could their Security be provided for, till the Act of Indemnity and Oblivion were pass'd.

He said, He found great industry used, (by those who did not wish that Peace to the Kingdom they ought to do) to persuade his good Subjects that he had no mind to make good his Promises, which he desired to perform for his own sake, as well as theirs. And that therefore he did very earnestly recommend it to them, that all expedition might be used in the passing That most necessary Act, whereby his good Subjects generally would be satisfied that their security was in their own hands, and depended upon their future Actions, and that they were free for all past, and so all the endeavours of ill men would be disappointed, who would persuade them not to do well now, because they had done amiss heretofore. And that he was the more engaged to this his Recommendation, because upon the resolution of their eminent Zeal and Affection for his Service, and hearty Concurrence with him him in all things desired from them, men were apt to persuade others (though not believing it themselves), that the passing of this Act was therefore not desired, because he did not enough press the dispatch of it; which he did desire from his heart, and was confident they would the sooner do it, upon his earnest recommendation.

This Message did so much quicken their Debates, that they dispatch'd the Bill in a very short time, and sent it up to the Lords, and the Peoples Minds were much Composed thereby, and the more, for that his Majesty by a Proclamation after it, did declare a kind of impatience for the delay thereof.

General Monk created Duke of Albemarle.

About the beginning of July, General Monk, was by Letters Patents under the Great Seal of England made Duke of Albemarle, Earl of Torrington, Baron Monk of Pothridge, Beauchampe, and Teyes, and Summoned by Writ to the House of Peers. The Titles of Albemarle and Beauchampe were confer'd on him, because he was descended from Margaret, one of the Daughters of the late Richard Beauchampe Earl of Albemarle and Warwick, who was married to the and Co-heirs of Richard Beauchampe Earl of Albemarle and Warwick, whose Sonne John had Famous Warriour John Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, well known in France, whose Sonne John had onely one Daughter married to Edward Grey Viscount Lisle, whose Daughter and Heir Elizabeth Gray was married to Arthur Plantagenet, a natural Son of King Edward the Fourth, who was in her right Viscount Lisle; and Frances one of the Daughters and Co-heirs of the said Viscount Lisle, was married to Sir Thomas Monk great Grandfather to the present Duke of Albemarle.

General Mountague made Earl of Sandwich. The Marquess of Ormond made Duke of Ormond.

And a few dayes after, Mr. Edward Mountague, one of the Generalls at Sea, was made a Knight of the Order of the Garter, and by Letters Patent dignified with the Honours of Earl of Sandwich, Viscount Mountague of Hinchbrook, and Baron of St. Needs. And the Marquess of Ormond was made Earl of Brecknock, and Baron Butler of Lanthony; and these Two in the same Order they were created, had Writs to Summon them to the House of Peers. Which Marquess was afterwards created Duke of Ormond.

The Lords in Parliament were in Consultation to except all from Pardon that had been Judges in any High Court of Justice, which was no more than such men deserved, who could so maliciously contribute to the Subversion of the good Laws and Government of their native Countrey; But the Kings Clemency extended to all who were not guilty of his Father's Murder; and observing those Debates to obstruct much the speedy perfecting that Bill he so earnestly desired to have finish'd, On the 27th of July he went to the said House, and in a handsome and most gracious Speech, expressed his Zeal for it in the following words:

My Lords,

The Kings Speech to the Parliament, to hasten the perfecting of the Act of Oblivion.

When I came first hither to you, which was within two or three dayes after I came to White-Hall, I did with as much earnestness as I could, both by my Self, and the Chancellor, recommend to you and the House of Commons, the speedy dispatch of the Act of Indemnity, as a necessary Foundation of that Security we all pray for; I did since, by a particular Message to the House of Commons, again press them to hasten that important Work; And did likewise by a Proclamation, publish to all the Kingdom, That I did with impatience expect that that ACT would be presented to me for my Assent, as the most reasonable and solid Foundation of that Peace, Happiness, and Security I hope and pray for to my Self and all my Dominions. I will not deny it to you, I thought the House of Commons too long about that Work, and therefore now it is come up to you, I would not have you Guilty of the same delay. I thank God, I have the same Intentions and Resolutions now I am here with you, which I had at Breck, and believe that I owe my being here, to Gods blessing upon the Intentions and Resolutions I then expressed to have. I will read to you what I then said:

And to the end that the fear of Punishment may not engage any, Conscious to themselves of what is passed, to a perseverance in Guilt for the future, by exposing the quiet and happiness of their Countrey, in the Restauration both of King, Peers, and People, to their Just, Ancient, and Fundamental Rights; We do by these Presents declare, That we do grant a Free and Generall Pardon, which we are ready upon demand, to passe under Our Great Seal of England, to all Our Subjects of what Degree or Quality soever, who within Forty dayes after the publishing hereof, shall lay hold upon this Our Grace and Favour, and shall by any publique Act declare their doing so; And that they return to the Loyalty and Obedience of good Subjects (excepting only such Persons as shall hereafter be excepted by Parliament.)

Those only excepted, let all Our Loving Subjects, how faulty soever, rely upon the Word of a King solemnly given by this present Declaration, That no Crime whatsoever committed against us or Our Royall Father, before the Publication of this, shall ever rise in

A in Judgment, or be brought in Question, against any of them to the least endamage of them, either in their Lives, Liberties, or Estates, or (as far forth as lies in Our Power) so much as to the prejudice of their Reputations, by any reproach or term of distinction from the rest of Our best Subjects: we Desiring and Ordaining, That henceforward all Notes of Discord, Separation, and Difference of Parties be utterly abolished among all Our Subjects, whom we Invite and Conjure to a perfect Union among themselves under Our Protection, for the Re-settlement of Our Just Rights, and Thiers, in a Free Parliament; By which, upon the Word of a King, we will be Advised.

My Lords, If you do not joyn with Me in extinguishing this Fear, which keeps the hearts of men awake, and apprehensive of safety and security; You keep Me from performing My Promise, which if I had not made, I am persuaded neither I, nor you had been now here: I pray let us not deceive those who brought, or permitted us to come together. I knew well there were some Men who could neither forgive themselves, nor be forgiven by us; and I thank you for your Justice towards those, the immediate Murthers of my Father: And I will deal truly with you, I never thought of excepting any other. I pray think well upon what I have offered, and the benefit you and I have received from that offer; and encourage and oblige all other persons, by not excluding them from the benefit of this Act. This Mercy and Indulgence is the best way to bring them to a true repentance, and to make them more severe to themselves when they find we are not so to them. It will make them good Subjects to me, and good Friends and Neighbours to you; and we have then all Our end, and you shall find this the safest Expedient to prevent future mischief. Therefore I do earnestly desire and Conjure you, to depart from all particular animosities and Revenge, or memory of past provocations; and that you will passe this Act without other Exceptions, than of those who were immediately guilty of that Murder of my Father.

My Lords, I have told you my Opinion, and I hope you will be of the same. If any persons appear of such dangerous and obstinate Principles, that the Peace of the Kingdom cannot be preserved whilst they have Liberty in it, some other course may be taken, that they shall not be able to do hurt; and I assure you, there is nothing can enable them to do so much harm, as the deserting the passing this Act.

I hope I need say nothing of Ireland, and that they alone shall not be without the benefit of my Mercy: They have shewed much affection to me abroad, and you will have a care of my Honour, and of what I have promised to them: I do again conjure you, that you will use all expedition in the dispatch of this Bill.

This Speech did not only expedite the passing of this ACT in the House of Peers, but gave a general Satisfaction to the People, who were exceedingly quiered in their Minds with the Kings resolute Care on the behalf of all his Subjects; nor was his Mind so intent on this necessary Affair, as to neglect the other Concerns of Government; But observing, that the late Differences of his People had created many Animositities amongst them, which occasioned frequent Duells, he thought fit to prevent the Inconveniencies thereof by a Proclamation; whereby he manifested so great a dislike of Duells, as strictly to Command all his Subjects whatsoever, neither by themselves nor any other by Message, Word or Writing, or other wayes or means, to Challenge or cause to be Challenged any person or persons to fight in Duell, nor to carry, accept, nor conceal any Challenge, nor actually to Fight, or be Second to any there.

His Majesties Proclamation against Fighting or Duelling.

And he further Declared, That every person offending against his Commands herein, should not only incur the Displeasure, but be incapable of holding any Office in his Service, and never after be permitted to come to Court or prefer'd, besides the suffering such punishments as the Law should inflict on such offenders; And all persons that should accept or know of such Challenges, and not reveal the same to one of the Privy Council, or the next Justice of Peace, should be liable to the same Penalties. And further, he was so severe in this matter, as to forbid any Intercession to be made for Offenders against this Proclamation.

By this good Government, a generall tranquillity appear'd in all the King's Dominions; and to lessen the Publique Charge, the Parliament were providing money to disband the Armies, and pay off such of the Ships as were more than needfull for the Guard of the Seas: And in order hereunto, the Generall was so provident, as to give Order to the Muster-Master-Generall to admit of no new Souldiers in any Troops or Companies, and the Officers likewise had Charge to entertain none upon any vacancies.

The English Commissioners in Scotland having been employed as Judges for the Government of that Nation, and having had their Commission continued in force for some time after the King's coming in, they were at length by Letters from the Duke of Albemarle acquainted with the King's Pleasure, That from the 22. of August they should cease to act any more in this their Judicatory power.

power, in regard that Kingdom was thenceforth to be reduc'd to its ancient form of Government; in order to which, Proclamation was made in the King's Name, for the speedy Convening of the Committee of the Three Estates of Scotland; a Parliament also being to be called there within a few Months; And in the interim, the Chief Ministers of State were Constituted; The Earl of Glencairn was made Lord Chancellor; the Lord Crawford-Lindsay Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Cassilis Justice-General, the Earl of Lauderdale Chief Secretary of State, and General Middleton the Kings Commissioner, with several others.

The Committee of Estates being assembled, made it their first care to keep all things in peace and quiet, and obedience to the present Government; for notwithstanding the late unanimous concurrence of the People at Edinburgh (as well as other places) in the publick Proclaiming of his Majesty, yet after a short while, there began to discover itself a spirit of discontent among certain Scotch Ministers, who were of the principal Sticklers of the Kirk-party, as appear'd by their meeting together at a place appointed, for the drawing up of a Remonstrance concerning certain things wherein they thought themselves aggrieved; which the Committee of Estates having notice of, sent forthwith to apprehend them, and clapt them up in prison; and for the prevention of the like disturbances for the future, set forth a Proclamation against all Unlawfull Meetings, and Seditious Papers.

And the same thing that befell these Ministers, hapned also to their Country-man the Marquess of Argyle, who notwithstanding that he came to Court with others of the Nobility and Gentry of Scotland, upon pretence of rendering his Service to his Majesty, yet he had not it seems carried himself so blamelessly, but that a sufficient cause was found for the laying of High Treason to his Charge, and committing him thereupon a prisoner to the Tower; and together with him were committed the Earl of Ardrim, Sir Henry Vane, and Sir Arthur Haslerigg, besides several others that follow'd soon after.

In Ireland the Convention that had assembled there upon the Change of Government, as soon as they had taken order for the settling of things in that Nation, in Conformity to the Kings Authority, (Colonel Eyer, who endeavour'd to raise a Party in opposition to it, being reduc'd by Sir Charles Coote) and had appointed from among them certain Commissioners to wait upon his Majesty with their Gratuulations and Desires, thought fit to dissolve themselves, in expectation of the Kings Pleasure for the Calling of a full Parliament, and to make way for the Ancient Constitution of the Government by a Lord Lieutenant, as had been determin'd by the King and his Council for that Grand Employment.

The Act of Indemnity was sent from the Lords to the Commons with several alterations, to which the Commons were very unwilling to agree; for they had subjected Twenty that were not the Kings Judges, to be liable to such Pains and Penalties not extending to life, as should be inflicted by another Act to be pass'd in this Parliament: Whereas the Lords finding the King's Inclination to tend towards the Pardoning of all but such as were his Fathers Judges, or otherwise Actors in his Murder, they disagreed to that part of the Act, as to all those named by the Commons, except Sir Arthur Haslerigg, Sir Henry Vane, and Colonel John Lambert, who were esteem'd to be so maliciously active in opposition to his Majesties Government, as to be excepted from any Conditions of Pardon: The Commons for some time adhered to their first Resolution, but after several Conferences, they agreed with the Lords in all things, except some little alterations to their frame of the Act; Vane and Lambert were excepted, but Haslerigg remained liable to such Pains, Penalties, and Forfeitures, as should be inflicted on him, not extending to life; and the rest of those put under the same Qualification by the Commons that were not of the King's Judges, were made only with others incapable of Offices, as shall be hereafter shewen, when we come to write of the parts of that ACT.

That which put Sir Arthur Haslerigg under so favourable a Qualification, was an Engagement made to him by the Duke of Albemarle; For Haslerigg coming to him, when he perceiv'd the Revolution hasten towards the Restauration of the King and his Government, he expostulated with him about it, in reference to the security of his own Condition: The Duke was unwilling to make him desperate, because he had at that time a Regiment of Horse, and a Regiment of Foot in the Garrisons of New-Castle, Tinmouth, Berwick, and Carlisle, under his Government; which (if he had oppos'd) could not have been reduced to obedience without the effusion of Blood, which his Excellency much endeavour'd to avoid in all the progress of his Actions; And therefore told him, If he would quietly give up his Command, and retire to his House, he would endeavour to secure him in his Life and Estate, and doubted not to effect it. This being made known at a Conference by the House of Commons, was justified with great modesty by the Duke in the House of Peers, and his Life was thereupon pardoned in the Act, and a small time after, his Estate also was, at the mediation of the Duke, granted to his Heir, a man averse to his Fathers disloyal Principles: (Sir Arthur himself, a while after his Imprisonment, dying of a Fever in the Tower.)

At this last Conference of the Lords and Commons, the Lord Chancellor took occasion to speak of the Kings Affection to his People, by a very remarkable Instance, saying, That he being employ'd in an Embassy to Spain, had it strictly given him in Charge by his Majesty to avow and declare, That the horrid Murder of his Royall Father was not the Act of the Parliament or People of England, but of a very wretched and little company of Miscreants in the Kingdom, Which was so pleasing to the House of Commons, that upon the report of it to them, they Order'd such of the Privy Council as were Members of that House, to present to his Majesty the humble and thankful Sense they had of his Justice

A Justice and Favour for that Just Defence he had been graciously pleas'd to make in behalf of the Parliament and People of England.

A few dayes after this, that is to say, the 29th of August, The King had Notice that there were Five Acts prepared for his Royall Assent, and he therefore repaired to the Lords House, and sent for the Commons to him, where he assented to them. The Acts were;

1. An Act for Confirmation of Judiciall Proceedings.
2. An Act for a speedy Provision of Money to pay off and disband all the Forces of this Kingdom both by Sea and Land.
3. An Act for the restraining the taking of Excessive Urury.
4. An Act of General Pardon, Indemnity, and Oblivion.
5. An Act for a perpetuall Anniversary Thanksgiving on the Twenty Ninth day of May, (the day of his Majesties Nativity and Restauration.)

At the passing of which ACTS, he express'd himself in these words:

My Lords, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I Have been here sometimes before with you, but never with more willingness, than I am at this time. And there be few men in the Kingdoms, who have longed more impatiently to have those Bills pass'd, than I have done, to passe them; and I hope they will be the Foundation of much Security and Happiness to Us all. I do very willingly pardon all that is pardoned by this Act of Indemnity, to that time which is mentioned in the Bill; Nay, I will tell you, That from that time to this day, I will not use great Severity, except in such Cases where the Malice is notorious, and the Publick Peace exceedingly concern'd: But for the time to come, the same Discretion and Conscience which dispos'd me to the Clemency I have express'd, which is most agreeable to my Nature, will oblige me to all Rigour and Severity, how contrary soever it be to my Nature, towards those who shall not now acquiesce, but continue to manifest their sedition and dislike of the Government, either to Action or Words.

"And I must conjure you all (my Lords and Gentlemen) to concur with Me in this Just and necessary severity; and that you will in your several Stations be so jealous of the Publick Peace, and of my particular Honour, that you will cause exemplary Justice to be done upon those who are guilty of seditious Speeches or Writings, as well as those who break out into seditious Actions: And that you will believe those who delight in reproaching and traducing My Person, not to be well affected to You and the Publick Peace.

"Never King valued himself more upon the affections of his people than I do; Nor do I know a better way to make My Self sure of your Affections, than by being Just and Kind to you all: And whilst I am so, I pray let the World see that I am possess'd of your Affections.

"For your Pole-Bill, I do thank you as much as if the Money were to come into my own Coffers; and with with all my heart that it may amount to as great a Summe as you reckon upon. If the Work be well and orderly done to which it is designed, I am sure I shall be the richer by it in the end: and upon My Word, if I had wherewithall, I would My Self help you, so much I desire the Business done.

"I pray very earnestly, as fast as Money comes in, discharge that great burthen of the Navy, and disband the Army as fast as you can; and till you can disband the rest, make a provision for their support. I do conjure you, as you love Me, let Me not hear the noyse of Free-Quarter, which will be imputed to My want of Care and Government, how Innocent soever I am; and therefore be sure you prevent it.

"I am so confident of your Affections, that I will not move you in any thing that immediately relates to My Self; and yet I must tell you, I am not richer, that is, I have not so much Money in my Purse as when I came to you; The truth is, I have lived principally ever since upon what I brought with Me; which was indeed your Money, for you sent it to Me, and I thank you for it. The Weekly expence of the Navy, eats up all you have given Me by

And that which troubles Me most, is, to see so many of you come to Me to White-Hall, and to think you must go somewhere else to seek your Dinner.

"I do not mention this to you, as any thing that troubles Me; do but take care of the Publicque, and for what is necessary for the Peace and Quiet of the Kingdom, and take your own time for My Own Particular, which I am sure you will provide for with as much affection and frankness as I can desire.

ACT for Confirmation of Judicial Proceedings.

The ACT for Confirmation of Judicial Proceedings, was as necessary at this Juncture, as the ACT of Generall Pardon, since without this, besides many other Inconveniencies, so great a Concussion would have been in most mens Estates, as would have made them subject to perpetuall Incertainties.

1. By this Law, All Proceedings in Law or Equity in all or any of the Courts at Westminster, or in Wales, or in the County Palatine or Duchy of Lancaster, or Berwick, or other Inferiour Courts, and all things done by the Judges and Officers in pursuance thereof, or of the Court of Admiralties, Bishops, Justices of Assize, Nisi Prius, Commissioners of Sewers, Bankrupts, or Charitable Uses, and all proceedings thereupon had in England since the First of May, 1642, were Confirmed, notwithstanding any defect of Legall Power, or difference in Style by Title.

2. All Fines Levied without paying the Kings Silver, or without entry of Money given for the Concord, or before one Judge only, were made good and effectual; And all Fines, Recoveries, Judiciall Proceedings in the Common-Pleas, since the death of the late Kings of Blains in Detention, were Confirmed.

3. Whereas since the First of May, 1642, and before the 20th of August, 1660, divers who adhered to both Houses of Parliament, had been Indicted for Treason, and others also who adhered to his Majestie or his Father, were impeached in like manner: All such Indictments and Proceedings thereupon, and Grants made of any Lands forfeited by reason thereof, and Title to the mean profits claimed in that respect were henceforth discharged, and restitution to be made to the respective persons and their Heirs.

4. All Recognizances, Bonds, and Securities made to the late Keepers, or Protector, not pardoned or discharged, were to be prosecuted in the name and to the use of his Majestie his Heirs and Successors.

To this fourth Branch, such Securities were excepted as had been given to the late Powers by any for their adherence to the King or his Father, or relating to the late Troubles, which was by this ACT made void; as likewise were all Obligations, Bonds, and Securities by Order of any Council of State, Committee of Safety, Major Generall, Decimators, or any other Military Power.

5. After the 8th of May, 1660, no Judges at Westminster, Sergeants at Law, Commissions of Sewers, or of Bankrupts, or of Charitable Uses, constituted by any of the late usurped Powers, were to be continued.

6. No nonclaim upon or after any Fine by this ACT confirmed, shall extend to barre any Person or their Heirs (other than the Parties to the said Fines, and their Heirs and Trustees) for such Rights as they had by colour of any ACT or pretended Ordinance of Parliament, since the First of May, 1642, and before the 25th of April, 1660, as of Crown-Lands, or of Church-Lands, or as the Lands of any person for adhering to the King, or his Father, or in relation to the late Troubles, so as such persons and their Heirs pursue their Claims by Actions or Entry within 5. years after the 29th of May, 1660.

7. The Name and Styles of the usurped Power and Authorities were declared to be Rebellious.

8. All Proceedings of High Treason for Levying War against Oliver Cromwell, or any other late usurped Power, were made void; as likewise all Assurances, Recognizances, and Judgments for Debt, or Damages heretofore had or suffered by any person whose Execution, Outlawry, or Attainder, was by this ACT discharged.

This ACT of Confirmation was nevertheless not to extend to confirm any illegall proceedings of the late High Courts of Justice, nor to confirm any Sales or Estates made by any pretended ACT of Parliament since the first of May, 1642, nor to debar any person grieved from having a Writ of Error, or Bill of Review, in such manner as formerly, Except such Errors and defects as were not by this ACT remedied.

A This last Exception, as to the Churches in Wales, was inserted by the Parliament in this Act, upon Information, that some Pious People had, in the time of the late Usurpation, procured to themselves an Authority to Sequester all those Revenues, upon pretence to employ them more equally to illiterate Preachers, for the better propagation of the Gospel in those parts, but kept the greatest part to their own use, leaving most of the Churches unsupplied.

3. All publique Duties levied by any Sheriff or other Officer for the use of the late King, or the late Powers, or the King in being, not accounted for or discharged, are excepted.

4. As also all offences done by any Jesuit, Seminary or Popish Priest contrary to the Statute of the 27th of Elizabeth. It is provided,

9. All Publique Monies paid in to any publique use, are pardoned, and Parties concerned so far as their acquittances extend unto, are to be discharged for the same. Nevertheless, those are not discharged that received any Money for the Tax of Decimation, or upon the Account of any Militia since 1648. not paid over and discharged by any that had a Legall or pretended authority to discharge the Receivers thereof.

10. The King's meniall Servants, or any that had directions from him, who whilst they pretended to act in his Service were treacherous thereunto, were exempted from the benefit of this Act, if they were Outlawed and Convinced within Two Years from the 25th of April, 1660.

All which Persons, for being Infrumentall in the Murder of the late King, are wholly excluded.

But in regard the Nineteen first mentioned rendered themselves, (according to a Declaration of the 6th of June, 1660.) and thereby pretended to some Favour, it is Enacted, That if the said Owen Rowe, and the rest so first mentioned, are Attainted, their Execution should be suspended, until the King and Parliament should order the same. (Only Adrian Scroop, though he was one of those that rendered themselves according to the forementioned Declaration, yet in regard at the time of presenting

14. These were of the number of the Kings Judges, but in regard they did not Sign the Warrant for Summoning the pretended Court, nor the Warrant for the Execution of his Majestie, their Lives C were spared.

Phelps, who was a Clerk in that Court, was put into the same Condition, as also Sir Arthur Haslerigg, who though he was not one of the Actors in that Tragedy, was as malicious an Enemy to the King, as any of the rest.

15. Hutchinson and Lassells, two others of the Judges, were made incapable to execute any Place of Trust, and Lassells to pay to the King one Years value of his Estate. Which Favours were extended to them for Reasons before expressed.

And all that had given Sentence of Death in any of the late Illegal High-Courts of Justice, or Signed any Warrant for Execution of any person there condemned (except Colonel Richard Ingoldsby, and Colonel Matthew Thomlinson), were disabled from being Members in any Parliament after the said First day of September, or bear any Office in England or Wales.

18. The Act Pardons not Bonds taken in his late Majestie's Name before 1642. for securing of any proper debt of any Servant, or Receiver of the King's Revenues, if they had not been paid to, or by order of, some lawful or pretended authority. Nor no person, his Heirs, Executors, &c. who had not paid their proportion of a Summe of 150000 l. (agreed to be paid as a Composition from the Farmers of several Customs illegally taken) or ought to have been contributory thereunto; but that the Estates of the dead as well as of the Living of such persons who ought to have been contributory, in whose possession soever (Purchasers bona fide upon valuable considerations only excepted), shall be chargeable with their Proportions, as if the Act had never been made.

Likewise all Arrears of Exchequer of Beer, Ale, or other Inland or Native Commodities since the 24th of June, 1659. are unpardoned, and all Monies due from any Officers or Souldiers for Free Quarter, since the 20th of July in the same Year, or Monies borrowed by Officers for preventing of Free-Quarter.

20. Lastly, No persons were to be indemnified who had entred into any Lands, Tenements, and Hereditaments, called Fabrick Lands, or possessed themselves of any Rents or Revenues given for the repair of any Cathedral or other church, or who sacrilegiously enriched themselves by the converting of the Plate, utensils, and Materials of or belonging to such Churches, to their private use, for, or in respect of the said Crimes only.

The Act for a Perpetual Anniversary does Enact, That in all succeeding Ages, the 29th of May be Celebrated in every Church and Chappell in England, and the Dominions thereof, by rendering Thanks to God for the King's Peaceable Restauration to the Actual Possession and Exercise of his Legall Authority over his Subjects. And all Ministers are to read the Act at Morning Prayer the Lords Day next before that Day, to give notice for the Observation thereof.

The ACT for Observation of a perpetual Anniversary for his Majesties Restauration.

C The King after the Passing these Acts, gave the Parliament notice, That on the 13th of September he would have them to Adjourn to the Sixth of November following; whereupon they were very diligent to compleat some Bills under Consideration. That which was of most Importance for the Peace of the Kingdom, was a Bill for the speedy Disbanding the Army and Garrisons, which they were very earnest in. The King intended to have made it a Session by Prorogation; but upon application made to him, to shew the inconvenience thereof at that time, because of many Bills and other matters of great Concernment depending, which would thereby be vacated, he consented to an Adjournment.

A time prefix by his Majesty for the Adjournment of the present Parliament.

The Parliament having taken notice of the King's Wants intimated in his last Speech at the Passing of the forementioned Acts, and provided for his Supply; In the next place, they likewise took Care that the Army should be supplied with Pay till they were Disbanded; Which was another of the Particulars of that Speech.

And now all things being ready for an Adjournment, the King on the 13th of September, which was the day appointed, came to the House of Lords, and there gave his Royall Assent to Fourteen Private, and Eight Publique Acts of Parliament.

Twenty Two Acts more; 14 Private, and 8 Publique, Sign'd by his Majesty.

The Private were,

2. An Act for the necessary Maintenance of the Work of Draining the great Levee E of the Fenns.
3. An Act to restore the Earl of Inchequin all his Honours and Lands in Ireland.

12. An Act for Regulating of the Trade of Bay-making in the Dutch Bay-Hall in Colchester.

The

1660.

13. The other Two private Bills were one of them to Naturalize Dorothea Helena Countess of Derby, Emilia Countess of Osfory; Margaret Lady Culpepper; And a Son and a Daughter of Katherine Stanhopp Countess of Chesterfield, by John Kirkhoven Lord of Henslet in Holland.

14. And the other for Naturalizing Peter de la Pierre alias Peters, and John de la Pierre alias Peters.

Of these Acts, we think it unnecessary to name more than the Titles, as being not of Publique Concernment; and every of the Titles are not here exactly inserted, it being sufficient for Publique Use, to describe so much of them as may inform Posterity of their tendency, and that such Acts were then passed; whereby those that are concerned, may be directed to a more curious search.

The Publique ACTS were,

1. An Act for the speedy Disbanding of the Army and Garrisons. The Title of this Act does so much express the Use of it, that We shall omit to mention more of it here; and the rather, because it was in a few Months fully Executed.

2. An Act for the supplying and explaining certain defects in an Act for the speedy Provision of Money for Disbanding and Paying off the Forces of this Kingdom both by Sea and Land.

We have already given you an abbreviation of that Act, whereof this last is Explanatory (which was the Poll-Bill lately described) and to which this being only relating in reference to the supply of some of its defects, We shall not need to enlarge thereon.

3. An Act for raising Seven score Thousand Pounds for the compleat Disbanding of the Army.

The Parliament finding the Poll-Bill to rise much short of expectation, from the failure of a due and Exact execution of it; They passed this Act, which ordained the Money to be raised in Two Months from the First of November 1660. (viz.) 70000 l. per Annum.

4. An Act for the speedy raising of 70000 l. for the present supply of his Majesty. This Money was to be paid in one Month from the 29th. of September following.

5. An Act to prevent Frauds and Concealments of his Majesties Customs and Subsidies. This Act was but to continue in force till the end of the first Session of the next Parliament.

6. An Act for the Confirming and restoring of Ministers.

This Act stopp'd the Clamours of many Ecclesiastical persons that had defective Titles to their Cures; and the goodness of the King was very much celebrated by his Consent to it. Wherefore it will not be amiss to give a brief touch of the Heads thereof.

It Enacts, That every Ecclesiastical person or Minister Ordained by any Ecclesiastical persons before December the 25th last past, being 24. years of age, having not renounced his Ordination, who hath been since January the first, 1642. placed in, and in Actual possession of any Ecclesiastical Benefice with Cure of Souls, in England, Wales, or Berwick upon Tweed, which hath been void by death, or any other avoidance, since that time, and before the 25th of December last past, and was then in possession, and received the Profits being in the Kings gift, or of his Father, or of any Archbishop, Bishop, Dean and Chapter, Prebend, Arch-Deacon, Body Politique or Corporate, or other person, other than such hereby restored, is declared lawful Incumbent.

Every voluntary Resignation of a Benefice to the Patron or any pretended Power since the said first day of January, to be good, as if made to the Competent Ordinary.

No Presentation is to be construed to be an usurpation in Law, to the prejudice of any that shall have right to Present.

Every Ecclesiastical person formerly Sequestered or Ejected after lawful Presentation and perception of the profits, that hath not subscribed any Petition to bring the late King to Tryall, or by any Act endeavoured or justified the Murder of the said King, or declared his Judgment against Infant-Baptism, by Preaching, Writing, Printing, or constant refusal to Baptize, shall be restored to the possession thereof, at or before the 25th day of December next ensuing; and every Ecclesiastical person to be removed, may enjoy the Profits to that day.

There be many other Clauses and Provisions in this Bill, too long to be here inserted; and so much the less important, in regard by some subsequent Lawes, the greatest part of the whole was in a manner repeal'd.

The Substance of the Act for Encouraging of Navigation.

7. An Act for Encouraging Shipping and Navigation; wherein it is Enacted, That from the First of December 1660. no Commodities shall be Imported or Exported out of any Lands, Islands, Plantations or Territories, belonging unto, or which may belong to, his Majesty, his Heirs and Successors, in Asia, Africa, or America, in any other Vessel but such as belong unto the People of England, Ireland, Wales, or Berwick, or are of them 1660.

A them built, or do belong to them as the right Owners, and whereof the Master and three fourths of the Mariners are English, under penalty of the loss of all the Goods Imported or Exported in other Vessels, as also of the Vessels with all its Guns, Furniture, Tackles, Ammunition, and Apparell, one third to his Majesty, his Heirs and Successors, and the other two thirds to the Governor of such Lands, Islands, Plantations or Territories, in case the Ship or Goods be there seized, and the other third part unto him that shall seize, inform, or sue for the same in any Court of Records, by Bill, Information, Plaint or Action, wherein no Essoin, Protection, or Wager of Law shall be allowed. And all Captains, and Commanders at Sea, by Commission from the King or his Successors, are required to bring in all Ships and Vessels so offending, and deliver them into the Court of Admiralty to be proceeded against; and in case of Condemnation, One moiety is to be divided to the Use of the Admirall and Commander, and their Companies, according to the Rules in Case of Prizes, and the other to the King and his Successors. With many other Clauses and Provisions tending much to the advancement of the English Manufacture.

8. The Eighth Publique Act was, An Act for enabling Soldiers of the Army to exercise Trades: A very grateful Law to many of the Inferiour Officers and Souldiers, and a good preparatory to their Disbanding; for many of them had been Apprentices, and without such such Provisions might have been left without any way of subsistence, when Arms were out of their hands.

C The King made a short Speech to both Houses of Parliament at the passing of these Bills, full of Sweetness, according to the affable temper of his Nature.

"He thanked them for their generall Care of the Publique, and other Particular respects to him, in that for his Satisfaction they had made Provision to pay off the Army which they were Disbanding; thereby to prevent Free Quarter; Adding, That though he kindly accepted their Present of Money, he would not employ any of it for the supply of his own occasions, till he should be assured the Publique had no need of it. He likewise took notice of the Bill concerning the Duke of Somerset, who, he said, had merited as much of the King as his Father, and himself, as a Subject could do; and that he was none of those who think that Subjects by performing their Duties in any extraordinary manner, do not oblige their Princes to reward them in an extraordinary manner; Nevertheless, he said, it seemed to be of an extraordinary nature, and indeed we do not remember any President in Story of the like: But the King was pleas'd to add, That he hop'd no man would envy this Duke, because he had done what a good Master should do to such a Servant.

The Kings Speech to the House at the passing of the said Bills.

After which, his Majesty refer'd to the Chancellor to speak of many other things which he had to Recommend to them: For in this time of their Recess, the Army was to be Disbanding, whereof many Discourses had been spread abroad by disaffected persons. Some said the King would keep them up; And others, That they would not suffer themselves to be disbanded. And though he had pass'd an ACT to Confirm Ministers, yet farther order was to be taken in reference to Church-Government; and particularly in respect to render Conscience as likewise about Purchases and Sales of Publique Lands, which had without any issue much taken up the time of both Houses; and therefore since the Parliament Adjourn'd before any thing in these Affairs was effected, it was expedient to satisfy the People with the Kings Intentions therein: Of which, and many other Matters of great Concernment to the Good and Quiet of the Kingdom, the Chancellor in a most Excellent Speech express'd himself as followeth.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

THE King tells you, He hath Commanded me to say many Particulars to You; and the truth is, he hath charg'd me with so many, that I have great reason to fear, that I shall stand in much need of his Mercy, for omitting many things he hath given me in Command, at least, for delivering them in more disorder and confusion, than matters of such Moment and Importance ought to be to such an Assembly, for which the King himself hath even a kind of Reverence, as well as an extraordinary Kindness.

I am to mention some things he hath done already, and many things he intends to do during this Recess, that you may see how well content soever he is, that you should have Ease, and Pleasure, and Refreshment, he hath designed work enough for himself.

The King hath thanked you for the Provision you have made, that there may be no Free-Quarter during the time the Army shall be Disbanding; and hath told you what he will do with that Money you have given him, if there should want wherewith to disband it: And now I hope you will all believe that his Majesty will consent to the Disbanding. A He will do so. And yet he doth not take it unkindly at their hands, who have thought that his Majesty would not disband this Army. It was a sober and rational Jealousie; No other Prince in Europe would be willing to Disband such an Army: An Army to which Victory is entailed, and which, humanly speaking, could hardly fail of Conquest where-so-ever he should lead it. And if GOD had not restored his Majesty to that rare felicity, he would be without apprehension of danger at home or from abroad, and without an ambition of taking from his Neighbours what they are possessed of. Himself would never disband this Army: An Army whose Order and Discipline, whose Sobriety and Manners, whose Courage and Sufferings, hath made it Famous and Terrible over the whole World: An Army of which the King and his Two Royal Brothers may say, as the Noble Grecian said of Aeneas,

Contulimusq; manus, experto credite, quantus*

In Clypeum assurgat, quo turbine corqueat hastam.

They have all Three, in severall Countries found themselves engaged in the midst of these Troops, in the heat and rage of Battle: and if any Common Soldier (as no doubt many may) will demand the old Romans Privilege for having encountered Princes single, upon my Conscience he will find both Favour and Preferment. They have all Three observed the Discipline, and felt and admired and loved the Courage of this Army, when they were in the midst of it. And I have seen them in a season when there was little else of Comfort in their lives, refresh themselves with Joy that the English had done the great work, the English had got the day, and then please themselves with the Imagination what wonders they should perform in the Head of such an Army.

And therefore when his Majesty is so entirely possessed of the Affection and Obedience of this Army, and when it hath merited so much from him, can it be believed or imagined, that he can without some regret part with them? No; My Lords and Gentlemen, he will never part with them; and the only way never to part with them, is to Disband them: Should it be otherwise, they must be exposed to the daily Importunity of his great Neighbours and Allies, and how could he refuse to lend them his Troops, of which he hath no need himself? His Majesty knows they are too good Englishmen, to wish that a standing Army should be kept up in the Bowells of their own Country, that they who did but in Bello Pacis gerere Negotium, and who, whilst an Army liv'd like good Husbandmen in the Country, and good Citizens in the City, will now become really such, and take delight in the benefit of that Peace they have so honestly and so wonderfully brought to pass. The King will part with them as the most indulgent Parents part with their Children for their Education, and for their Preferment; he will prefer them to Disbanding, and prefer them by Disbanding; and will always retain such a Kindness for them, and such a memory of the Service they have done him, that both Officers and Souldiers, after they are disbanded, shall always find such Countenance, Favour, and Reward from his Majesty, that he doubts not, but if he should have occasion to use their Service, they will again resort to him with the same alacrity, as if they had never been Disbanded: And if there be any so silly amongst them (as there can be but very few, if any) who will forfeit the Favour and Protection they may have from him, by any withstanding his Majesties Commands, and the full and declared Sense of the Kingdome, his Majesty is confident they will be as odious to their Companions, as they can be to any other honest men.

My Lords and Gentlemen, I am in the next place by the Kings Command, to put you in mind of the Act of Indemnity, not of any Grants or Concessions, or Releases he made to you in that Act; I have nothing of that in Charge: No Prince hath so excellent a memory to forget the Favours he doth; But of what he hath done against you in that Act, how you may be undone by that Act, if you are not very careful to perform the Obligations he hath laid upon you in it. The Clause I am to put you in mind of is this; And to the intent and purpose that all names and terms of distinction may likewise be put into utter Oblivion; Be it further Enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That if any person or persons within the space of Three Years next ensuing, shall presume maliciously to call, or allude, or object, against any other person or persons, any name or names, or other words of reproach, any way leading to revive the memory of the late differences, or the occasion thereof, that then every such person so as aforesaid offending, shall forfeit, &c. It is no matter for the Penalty, it is too cheap a one, the King wishes it had been greater, and therefore hath by his just Prerogative (and 'tis well for us he hath such a Prerogative) added another Penalty more insupportable, even his high displeasure against all who shall siveer from this Clause in the Act: Give me leave to tell you, That as any name or names, or other words of reproach, are expressly against the Letter, and punishable accordingly; so evil and envious Looks, murmuring and discontented hearts, are as directly against the Equity of this Statute, a direct breach of the Act of Indemnity, and ought to be punished too, and I believe they may be so. You know Kings are in some sense called Gods, and so they may in some degree be able to look into mens hearts; and God hath given us a King, who can look as far into mens hearts as any Prince alive; and he hath great skill in Physiognomy too; you would wonder what Calculations he hath made from thence: and no doubt if he be provoked by evil Looks to make a further inquiry into mens hearts, and finds those corrupted with the Passions of Envy and Uncharitableness, he will never choose those hearts to trust and rely upon. He hath given us a Noble and Princely Example, by opening and stretching his Arms to all who are worthy to be his Subjects, worthy to be thought Englishmen, by extending his Heart with a Pious and grateful Joy to find all his Subjects at once in his Arms, and himself in theirs; and shall we fold our Arms towards one another, and contract our hearts with Envy and Malice to each other, by any sharp memory of what hath been unneighbourly or unkindly done heretofore? What is this but to Rebel against the Person of the King, against the excellent Example and Virtue of the King, against the known Law of the Land, this blessed Act of Oblivion?

My Lords and Gentlemen, The King is a Suitor to you, makes his Suit very heartily, That you will join with him in restoring the whole Nation to its Primitive temper, and Integrity, to its old good Manners, its old good Humour, and its old good Nature; Good Nature, a Virtue so peculiar to you, so appropriated by God Almighty to this Nation, that it can be translated into no other Language, hardly practis'd by any other People; And that you will by your Example, by the Candor of your Conversation, by your Precepts, and by your Practice, and by all your Interest, teach your Neighbours and your Friends, how to pay a full obedience to this Clause of the Statute, how to learn this Excellent Art of Forgetfulness.

Let them remember, and let us all remember, how ungracious, how indecent, how ugly, the insolence and fierceness, the brutishness of their Enemies appeared to them; and we may piously and reasonably believe, that Gods Indignation against them, for their want of Bowells, for their not being Englishmen, (for they had the hearts of Pagans and Infidels) sent a whirlwind in a moment to blow them out of the world; that is, out of a Capacity to do more mischief in the world; Except we practise their Vices, and do that our selves, which we pretend to detest them for.

Let us not be too much alarmed, as if what hath been done amiss, proceeded from the Humour, and the Temper, and the Nature of our Nation. The Astrologers have made us a fair Excuse, and truly I hope a true one. All the Motions of these last Twenty Years have been unnatural; and have proceeded from the Evil influence of a Malignant Star; And let us not too much despise the Influence of the Stars. And the same Astrologers assure us, That the Malignity of the Star is expired, the good Genius of this Kingdom is become Superiour, and hath mastered that Malignity; and our own good old Stars govern us again; and their influence is so strong, that with our help they will repair in a year what hath been decaying in Twenty: And they only shall have no excuse from the Star, who continue this Malignity, and own all the ill that is past to be their own, by continuing it, and improving it for time to come.

If any body here, or any where else, be too much exalted with what he hath done, or what he hath suffered, and from thence thinks himself warranted to reproach others, let him remember the Story of Nicephorus; it is an excellent Story, and very applicable to such distempers; He was a Pious and Religious man, and for his Piety and Religion was Condemned to the Fire; when he was led to Execution, and when an old Friend who had done him injury enough, fell at his feet and asked his pardon, the Poor man was so elated with the Triumph he was going unto, with the Glory of Martyrdom, that he refused to be reconciled unto him; upon which he was disappointed of his end; and for his Uncharitableness; the Spirit of God immediately forsook him, and he apostatized from the Faith.

Let all those who are too proud of having been, as they think, less faulty than other men, and so are unwilling to be reconciled to those who have offended them, take heed of the Apostacy of Nicephorus, and that those fumes of Envy and Uncharitableness, and Murmuring, do not so far transport and intoxicate them, that they fall into those very Crimes, A they value themselves for having hitherto declined.

But, my Lords and Gentlemen, whilst we conspire together to execute faithfully this part of the Bill, to put all old Names and Terms of distinction into utter Oblivion, let us not find new Names and Terms to keep up the same, or a worse distinction: If the old reproaches of Cavalier, and Round-head, and Malignant, be committed to the grave, let us not find more significant and better words, to signify worse things: let not Piety and Godliness grow into terms of reproach, and distinguish between the Court, and the City, and the Country; and let not Piety and Godliness be measured by a morosity in manners.

An affectation of Gesture, a new mode and tone of speaking, at least, let not our Constitutions and Complexions make us be thought of a contrary party, and because we have not an affected austerity in our looks, that we have no piety in our hearts; very merry men have been very godly men; and if a good Conscience be a continual Feast, there is no reason but men may be merry at it.

You Mr. Speaker have this day made a Noble Present to the King; do you think, that if you and your worthy Companions, had brought it up with folded Arms, down-cast looks, with sighs and other instances of desparation, it would not have been a very Melancholick Present? Have not your Frank and Dutiful expressions, that cheerfulness and vivacity in your looks, render'd it much more acceptable, much more valuable?

No Prince in Christendom loves a cheerful giver so well as God Almighty does, and he of all gifts a Cheerful heart, and therefore I pray let not a cloudy or discontented face be the only or the best sign of Piety and Devotion in the heart.

I must ask you pardon for misplacing much of this Discourse, which I should have mentioned when I came to speak of the Ministers Bill; I say, I hope, will endeavour to remove those new marks of distinction and Reproaches, and keep their Auditors from being imposed upon by such Characters and descriptions. The King hath passed this Act very willingly, and done much to the end of this Act before, yet hath willingly admitted you to be Sharers and Partners with him in the Obligation: I may say confidently, his Majesty hath never denied his Confirmation to any man in possession who hath asked it; and they have all had the effect of it, except such who, upon examination and inquiry, appeared not worthy of it, and such who, though they are Pardoned, cannot yet think themselves worthy to be preferred. His Majesty well knows, that by this Act he hath gratified and obliged many worthy and Pious men who have contributed much to his Restauration, and who shall always receive fresh evidences of his Majesties Favour and Kindness; but he is not sure that he may likewise have gratified some who did neither contribute to his Coming in, nor are yet glad that he is in; how comes it else to pass, that he receives such frequent Information of Seditious Sermons in the City and in the Country, in which all Industry is used to alienate the affections of the People, and to infuse Jealousies into them of the King and his Government, they talk of introducing Popery, of Evil Counsellours, and such other old Calumnies as are pardoned by this Act of Indemnity.

His Majesty told you, when he was last here, That Rigour and Severity he will hereafter use, how contrary soever it is to his Nature in these cases, and conjured you, my Lords and Gentlemen, to Concurr with him in this Just and Necessary Severity; which I am sure you will do with your utmost Vigilance; and that you will believe that too much ill cannot befall those who do the best they can to corrupt his Majesty's Nature, and to extinguish his Mercy.

My Lords and Gentlemen, I told you I was to acquaint you with some things his Majesty intends to do during this Recess, that you may see he will give no intermission to his own Thoughts for the Publique good, though for a time he dispences with your assistance.

He doth consider the infinite importance the improvement of Trade must be to this Kingdom, and therefore his Majesty intends to establish a Council for Trade, consisting of some Principal Merchants of the several Companies, to which he will add some Gentlemen of Quality and Experience; And for their greater Honour and Encouragement, some of my Lords of his own Privy Council.

In the next place, his Majesty hopes, that by a well settled Peace, and God's great Blessing upon Him and You, this Nation will in a short time flourish to that degree that the Land of Canaan did, when Elau found it necessary to part from his Brother. For their Riches were more than that they might dwell together, and the Land wherein they were could not bear them, because of their Cattel. We have been our selves very near this Pinnacle of Happiness; and the hope and contemplation that we may be so again, disposes the

A King to be very solicitous for the Improvement and Prosperity of his Plantations abroad, where there is such large room for the Industry and Reception of such who shall desire to go thither. And therefore his Majesty intends likewise to Erect and Establish a Council for those Plantations, in which persons well qualified, shall be wholly intent upon the good and advancement of those Plantations.

There are two other Particulars which I am Commanded to mention, which were both mentioned and recommended to You by his Majesty in his Declaration from Breda: The One, for the Confirmation of Sales, or other recompence for Purchasers: The Other, for the Composing those differences and distempers in Religion which have too much disturbed the Peace of the Kingdom. Two very weighty Particulars, in which his Majesty knows you have spent much time, and concerning which he should have heard from you before this time, if you had not met with great difficulties in the disquisition of either.

For the First, his Majesty hath not been without much thought upon the Argument, and hath done much towards the accommodation of many particular persons; and you shall not be at your Journeys end, before his Majesty will put that business concerning Sales into such a way of dispatch, that he doubts not, you will find a good progress made in it before your coming together again; and I believe the persons concerned will be very much to blame if they receive not good satisfaction: and some of you, who stay in Town, shall be advised C and consulted with, in that Settlement.

The other of Religion, is a sad Argument indeed, it is a consideration that must make every Religious heart to bleed, to see Religion, which should be the strongest Obligation and Cement of Affection and Brotherly Kindness and Compassion, made now, by the perverse wranglings of passionate and forward men, the ground of all Animosity, hatred, malice and Revenge. And this unruly and unmanly passion (which no Question the Divine Nature exceedingly abhors) sometimes, and I fear too frequently, transports those who are in the right, as well as those who are in the wrong, and leaves the latter more excusable than the former, when men who find their Manners and Dispositions very conformable in all the necessary obligations of humane Nature, avoid one anothers Conversation, and grow first unsociable, and then uncharitable to each other, because one cannot think as the other doth; And from this separation we entitle God to the Patronage of, and concernment in, our fancies and distinctions, and purely for his sake hate one another heartily.

It was not so of old, when one of the most Ancient Fathers of the Church tells us, That Love and Charity was so signal and eminent in the Primitive Christians, that it even drew admiration and envy from their adversaries. Vide (iniquit) ut invicem se diligunt! Their Adversaries, in that in which they most agreed in their very prosecution of them, had their passions and animosities amongst themselves; they were only Christians that Loved, and Cherished, and Comforted, and were ready to die for one another. Quid nunc illi Dicerent Christiani, si nostra viderent tempora? says the Incomparable Grotius; How would they look upon our sharp and virulent Contentions in the Debates of Christian Religion, and the bloody Wars that have proceeded from those Contentions, whilst every one pretended to all the marks which are to attend upon the true Church, except only that which is inseparable from it, Charity to one another.

My Lords and Gentlemen, this Disquisition hath cost the King many a Sigh, many a sad hour, when he hath considered the almost irreparable reproach the Protestant Religion hath undergone from the Divisions and Distractions which have been so notorious within this Kingdom; what pains he hath taken to compose them, after several Discourses with Learned and Pious men of different persuasions, you will shortly see by a Declaration he will publish upon that occasion; by which you will see his great indulgence, to those who can have any Protection from Conscience to differ with their Brethren. And I hope God will so bless the Candor of his Majesty in the Condescensions he makes, that the Church as well as the State will return to that Unity and Unanimity, which will make both King and People as happy as they can hope to be in this world.

My Lords and Gentlemen, I shall conclude with the King's hearty Thanks to you, G not only for what you have done towards him, which hath been very signal; but for what you have done towards each other; for the Excellent Correspondence you have maintain'd; for the very seasonable difference and condescension you have had for each other, which will restore Parliaments to the veneration they ought to have. And since his Majesty knows that you all desire to please him, you have given him ample evidence that you do so. He hath appointed me to give you a sure receipt to attain that good end; it is a Receipt of his own prescribing, and therefore it is not like to fail.

Be but pleas'd your selves, and perswade others to be so; contrive all the ways imaginable for your own Happiness, and you will make Him the best pleas'd and the most happy Prince in the World.

After this Speech the King retired, and both Houses of Parliament Adjourned themselves to the Sixth of November.

In the ACT for the speedy Disbanding of the Army and Garrisons, That Affair was committed to Twelve Commissioners, (Six whereof were Lords, and Six Commons) or to any Three of them, whereof one of the Commissioners named by the Lords, and one named by the Commons, were to be Two: And that they might not go far about for the Money, The Treasurers at War, and Treasurer named in the Act for the speedy Provision of Money for Disbanding the Army, were to Issue Moneys upon their Warrant.

All the Regiments and Garrisons were Disbanded by Lott, except Four Companies in Hull, four in Berwick, and four in Carlisle, which were reserved to be last reduced: And the Regiments belonging to the Dukes of York and Gloucester, and the Lord General, were not to be Disbanded till after all the other Regiments and Garrisons, except the Three before mentioned. There were Disbanded in England and Wales, Eighteen Regiments of Foot, consisting of a Thousand Souldiers in each Regiment, besides Officers, and Thirteen Regiments of Horse, having Six hundred Souldiers in each Regiment besides Officers, together with the General's Life-Guard of Horse, consisting of Two Hundred, and about Fifty Garrisons which had not in them less than 5000 Souldiers, besides Officers. And in Scotland Three Regiments and Two Companies of Foot, and Two Regiments, except one Troop of Horse, and about Thirteen Garrisons; but most of these Garrisons were not under particular Establishment, as those in England, but were mann'd by Companies out of the respective Regiments. The King, out of his own Bounty, gave a Weeks Pay over and above their full Arrears to all the Troops and Companies disbanded; Which was very Thankfully accepted by them.

Moreover, he was so well Satisfied with the Services of many of his Subjects in Ireland, who Joyned with the Duke of Albemarle for his Restauration, that he Conferred Rewards and Honour upon many of them according to the report of their merit; amongst these, Sir Charles Coote was made Earl of Monrath; Roger Lord Braghill advanced to the Dignity of Earl of Orrery; Colonel Richard Coote, a Brother to the Earl of Monrath, was created Baron of Coldowney; and Sir John King Baron of Kingston; and shortly after, Sir John Cluworth was made Viscount Masfarrine.

Besides the many Addressees that were made to the King by his own Subjects generally from all parts of his Dominions, there also came over Forrain Agents and Embassadors from severall of the greatest Princes and States of Europe, to Complement his Majestie in the Name of their Masters, touching his happy Restauration to his Royall Dignity and Government: From the Marquies of Brandenburg came the Baron of Pelwitz, Master of the Horse to his Highness. From Frederick Prince Palatine of the Rhine, Cozen-German to his Majesty of England, came Christopher Clifs of Keimbergh, Captain of his Guards. From the King of Denmark came the Lord Frederick Van Alfeld, Deputy-Governour of the Dukedoms of Sleswick and Holstein. But never did any Embassador arrive in England in a more Splendid and gallant Equipage than the Prince of Ligne, who being sent Embassador to our King from the King of Spain, seems to have come only upon a Gratulatory and Complemental Address, in regard there needed no Negotiation about any Peace between England and Spain, so far as upon the coming in of his present Majestie, there follow'd by consequence a reviving of that Peaceful and Friendly Correspondence which had formerly been between these Two Crowns in the time of the late King. And to this purpose his Majestie set forth a Proclamation, Requiring that (whereas the King of Spain had Commanded throughout his Dominions a Cessation from all Hostility towards this Crown, and had propos'd, that the Publication thereof might be on both sides agreed on by a fix day) all Acts of Hostility should likewise cease on our parts, toward the Subjects of that Crown; which Cessation was to be reckoned as taking beginning from the day of his Majestie's Arrivall in England, being the 25th of May, and that all Goods and Merchandizes which had been taken from that time, should be restored.

As the occasion of the Prince de Ligne's coming over was onely Gratulatory and Complemental, so his stay here was but short; and after his Departure, there remain'd here as the King of Spain's Lieger or Embassador in Ordinary, the Baron of Batteville. In the same manner, on the part of the French was the Count of Soissons, succeeded by Monsieur d'Elstrade, who had not been long here ere an Occasion hapned, which manifested, that the late concluded Peace between these two Kings had not any whit lessen'd the Jealousie of Honour between them and their old prepossessions in point of Precedence: Many troublesome Contentts there have formerly been between the Embassadors of these Two Crowns in the Courts of Forrain Princes and States, when they have chanc'd to be Resident together at the same place; but none more remarkable than that upon Tower-Hill, at the Landing of an Embassador from Sweden on the 30th of September: Which since it was so prepar'd and premeditated a Business on both sides, that his Majestie foreseeing it would come to a Quarrell, and out of his accusom'd Civility willing to carry himself with an equal and impartial Indifference toward them both, and so far to gratifie their Intentions, as to

The KING complemented by the Embassadors and Agents of Forrain Princes, Peace renew'd with Spain.

A permit them to put their Retinue into such a posture as they should think fittest, and most becoming their respective Pretences: Yet in the mean time taking order for strict Guards to be kept upon the place, for the preventing, as much as might be, of all disturbances; and severely prohibiting any of his own Subjects to intermeddle in the difference, or to take part with either side; was pleas'd to Command, That the formerly mention'd Mr. Evelyn should, after diligent Enquiry made concerning the Carriage and Success of that whole Affair, render him a particular Accompt thereof, by drawing up a full Narrative of every Circumstance of that Rencontre: Which being a matter of so rare a kind, and great Importance, We have here thought meet to insert from that Gentleman's more sedulous and ample Collection, as it was by him presented to his Majestie in this following relation:

B Upon Monday last, being the 30th of September, about Ten in the Morning, the Spanish Embassadors Coach (in which were his Chaplain, with some of his Gentlemen, attended by about Forty more of his own Servants in Liveries) was sent down to the Tower-Wharf, and there plac'd itself near about the Point, where the Ranks of Ordnance determine towards the Gate leading into the Bulwark. Next after him came the Dutch, and (Twelve a Clock past) the Swedish Coach of Honour, disposing of themselves according to their places. About Two hours after this (in company with his Majestie's Coach-Royall) appear'd that of the French Ambassadors, wherein were Le Marquies de Strade, Son to the French Ambassadors, with several more of his Gentlemen, and, as might be computed, near an Hundred and fifty in Train, whereof above Forty were Horsemen well appointed with Pistols, and (some of them) with Carabines, Musketoons or Fuzies: In this Posture and Equipage stood they expecting upon the Wharf, and as near as might be, approaching to his Majestie's Coach, which was opposite to the Staires. About Three in the Afternoon, the Swedish Ambassadors being Landed, and receiv'd into his Majestie's Coach, (which mov'd leisurely before the rest, and was follow'd by that of the Swedes) The French Ambassadors Coach endeavour'd to go the next, driving as close as possibly they could, and advancing their Party with their Swords drawn, to force the Spaniards from the Guard of their own Coach, which were also sputting in for Precedency next the King's. His Majestie's Coach now pass'd, the Spaniards (who held as yet their Rapiers undrawn in their hands) stepping nimbly on either side of the hind-most Wheels of their Master's Coach, drew their Weapons, and shouted, which caus'd the French Coach-horses to make a Pause: But, when they observ'd the advantage, which by this, the Spanish Ambassadors Coach had gain'd, being now in file after the Swedes, they came up very near to the Spaniards, and at once, pouring in their shot upon them, together with their Foot (then got before their Coach) fell to it with their Swords; both which the Spaniards receiv'd, without removing one jot from their Stations.

During this Demelle, (in which the French receiv'd some repulse, and were put to a second stand) a bold and dextrous Fellow, and (as most affirm) with a particular Instrument, as well as address, flooping under the bellies of the French Ambassadors Coach-Horses, cut the ham-strings of two of them, and wounded a third; which immediately falling, the Coach for the present was disabled from advancing farther, the Coach-man forced out of his Box, and the Postillion mortally wounded, who falling into the arms of an English Gentleman that stepped in to his succour, was by a Spaniard pierced through his Thigh. This disorder (wherein severall were wounded, and some slain) caus'd those in the French to alight, and so enraged their Party, that it occasion'd a second brisk Assault both of Horse and Foot; which being receiv'd with extraordinary Gallantry, many of their Horse retreated, and wheel'd off to St. Katharines.

It was in this Skirmish that some Brick-batts were thrown from the edge of the Wharf, which (by a mistake) are said to have been provided by the Spanish Ambassadors Order the day before: But that they were not cast by any of the English, is attested by the general consent of all the Spectators.

In this interim then (which was near half an hour) the Spanish Coach went forward after his Majestie's, with about Twenty of its Retinue following, who still kept their Countenances towards the French, as long as they abode on the Wharf and that narrow Passage of the Bulwark, (where the Contest was very fierce) without disorder: So as the first which appear'd on Tower-Hill (where now they were entering) was his Majestie's Coach, follow'd by the Swedes Ambassadors; and next, by that of Spain, with about Twenty Four or Thirty of his Liveries, still disputing it with a less number of French, who came after them in the Rear.

And here, (besides what were slain with Bullets on the Wharf, and near the Bulwark, whereof one was a Valet de Chambre of the Spanish Ambassadors, and Six more, amongst which a poor English Plaiherer, and near Forty wounded) fell one of the French, who was kill'd just before his Highness's Life-Guard; no one person of the numerous Spectators intermeddling, or, so much as making the least noise, or tumult, People, or Souldiers, whereof there were Three Companies of Foot, which stood opposite on the Hill to the Guards of Horse, 'twixt whom the Antagonists lightly Skirmish'd, some fresh Parties of French coming out of severall places, and protected by the English, amongst whom they found shelter, till the Spanish Ambassadors Coach having gain'd, and paid the Chain which leads into Crochu-Friers, they desisted, and gave them over.

What ever disadvantage the French came off with in this Rencounter, wherein, except one man that fought among the Spaniards with a Half Pike, not any of the English were seen to Act any thing that might contribute to the success of one side more than another, till a few of the multitude which stood on that side of the Wharf, being enrag'd by the Wounds which they receiv'd from the shot that came in amongst them, and whereof, 'tis said, some of them afterwards died, were forc'd to defend themselves with what they found at hand: For so Careful was Sir Charles Barclay, Captain of his Royal Highness's Life-Guard, to put in execution what he had in strict Charge from his Majestie, that not a man of the Spectators was suffe'd with impunity so much as with a Switch in his hand. The French King, from this occasion, gain'd an advantage to the Prerogative he stood upon, greater than if this Contest had not hapned; For whereas this business of Precedence had been hitherto in Controversie between him and Spain, inasmuch that to prevent all Inconveniencies, an Accord had been lately made here between the Spanish Embassadour and the Count of Soissons, That they should assist at no Publick Ceremonies but upon all such casual Encounters, pats on their way as they fortun'd to meet: The King of France countermanding this Agreement, and sending positive Charge to de Strade, not to abate any thing of those Pretensions formerly stood upon; and hearing what ensued upon his Embassadour's executing of his Injunctions, was so Incend'd thereat, that the Quarrel had proceeded to an absolute Breach of the late concluded Peace between the Two Kingdoms, had not the King of Spain Condescended to agree, That thence-forward Precedence should be yielded to the French upon all such like occasions, without any dispute.

On the 23 of this Month, the Prince's Royall of Great Britain having recommended the Interests of her Son the Prince of Aurange to the care of the Lords States of the Netherlands, (who now at length had agreed among themselves to admit this Young Prince to the same Dignity and Trust which his Ancestours formerly held in that Commonwealth, of which they had so highly merited) came over into England, invited by his Majestie, and willing once again to see her Native Country from which she had so many years been absent: But her Joy to see the King her Brother peaceably Inthron'd, was very much ally'd by her Sorrow for the loss of her Third Brother, Henry of Oulands Duke of Gloucester, who in the 21. year of his age (to the great Grief of the King his Brother, and all those that knowing and admiring the Princely Vertues of his Youth, had promis'd Wonders to the World from the hopes of his Elder age) departed this Life on the 13th of September, being the same day the Parliament adjourn'd, which was near the space of Four Months after his Arrivall in England: so that he survived little longer than just to attend upon his Brother to his Throne. He was a Prince Excellently accomplish'd, Religious, Learned, Valiant, Wise above his Years, a Dutiful and Affectionate Brother, a Wife Counsellour, a Good Master, and a True Friend. And as if Fate had so provided, that being himself of the most Noble, he should also in death be accompany'd by the most Noble, there died much about the same time, two of the same Order with himself, and next him in Quality, Esme Duke of Lenox and Richmond, and William Marquis of Hertford, who was also not long before his death restored by his now Majestie to the Ancient Dignity of his Ancestours, being created Duke of Somerset; and also to the Honour he had merited in the time of his late Majestie, of being Lord Chancellour of the University of Oxford: In which last Dignity he is succeeded by Sir Edward Hyde Lord High Chancellour of England.

Commissioners having been appointed by the Parliament to Pay off and Disband the Army and Navy, a speedy and effectual Course having been by them taken, as hath been already mention'd, for the Paying off and Disbanding the several Regiments and Ships as fast as Money came in by the Act of Poll-Money and the other Acts of Assessments made to that End by the Parliament before their Adjournment: In lieu of these Disbanded Forces, all the several Counties of the Nation under the Conduct of certain Noblemen, who were Constituted the King's Lieutenants over them according to the Ancient Custom, were Armed with their own Militia or Train'd Bands; Not so much in any apprehension of inquiet from the Souldiers, for they had so good Officers placed over them by the Lord Generall, that there was no fear of disorder from them; but lest any seditious persons might think themselves capable of making disturbance, if no Armed Force should be ready to prevent their Mischiefs.

And by this means, the Country was both settled into such a Posture of Military Defence, as to be able at a short warning to appear in Arms, and also freed from the continual Charge of maintaining a standing Army, whereof there would be no appearance, except in case of Emergent Danger.

As matters of Civill, so likewise those of Ecclesiastical Concernment were had in serious regard by his Majestie, who judging the Form of Church-Government which had been Establish'd in England from the time of the Reformation, till the late Troubles, to be the most Ancient and Decent way of Worship and Discipline, and most tending to Uniformity in Religion, made it one of his first businesses to restore the late extruded Episcopacy to the Dignity and Authority they formerly exercised in the Church of England; To which end, he speedily proceeded to the nomination of such Persons as were approv'd to be of the most eminent for Learning and Piety, for the supplying of those Bishops See's, which were become vacant since the first time of the Abrogation of their power.

In the Month of October, Owen Roe, Augustine Garland, and 27. more of the Regicides, Murderers of the late King, excepted out of the Act of Indemnity and Oblivion, were Arraigned at the Old Bailey upon a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, directed to Thomas Allen Knight and

A and Baronet, Lord Mayor of London, Sir Edward Hyde Lord Chancellour of England, The Earl of Southampton, the Duke of Somerset, the Duke of Albemarle, The Lord High Steward, the Earl of Lindsey, Earl of Manchester, Earl of Dorset, Earl of Berkshire, Earl of Sandwich, Lord Roberts, the Lord Finch, Denzell Holles Esquire, Sir Frederick Cornwallis Knight and Baronet, Sir Charles Barkley, Knight; Mr. Secretary Nicholas, Mr. Secretary Morrice, Sir Anthony Ashley-Cooper, Arthur Annesley Esquire, Sir Orlando Bridgman, Lord Chief Baron, Mr. Justice Foster, Mr. Justice Mallet, Mr. Justice Hyde, Mr. Justice Atkins, Mr. Justice Twissden, Mr. Justice Tirrell, Mr. Baron Turner, Sir Harbottle Grimstone Knight and Baronet, Sir William Will Knight and Baronet, Recorder of London, Mr. Serjeant Brown, Mr. Serjeant Hale, John Howell Esquire.

B The Prosecutors on behalf of his Majestie, were Sir Jeffery Palmer his Majestie's Attorney General, Sir Henage Finch his Majestie's Solicitor General, Sir Edward Turner, Attorney to his Highness the Duke of York, and Wadham Windham Esquire, Edward Shelton Esquire attended the Clerk of the Crown.

The Prisoners being called, they all pleaded Not Guilty, except Sir Hardeys Waller, and Mr. George Fleetwood, who pleaded Guilty; But the Crimes were so odious, and the Proofs so clear, that the Jurors scarce ever went from the Barr to deliberate, but found them all Guilty; and Ten of them were Executed, viz. Harrison, Carey, Scott, Clement, Jones, Scoop, Cook, and Peters, at Charing-Cross; and Hacker and Axtell at Tyburn: William Hale (who was also found Guilty, being accused to be one of those that in a Frock and Vizard assisted in the horrid Execution of the King, and therefore excepted from Pardon, though not by name) in regard that the Evidence seem'd not so clear to the Court, upon their report to the King, he had his Reprieve; and all the rest were respited, till the King and Parliament should order their Execution according to the direction in the Act of Indemnity in that behalf.

The King thought it high time to settle the Peace of Scotland, as well as that of his other Dominions; and in order thereunto he summon'd a Parliament to meet at Edinburgh the 12th day of December: And by his Proclamation in that Kingdom, signified to all, That he relyed so much on the Loyalty, Prudence, and Care of his Parliament, as absolutely to commit to them the Trying and Judging of the Carriage of his Subjects during the late Troubles, concerning which he would receive Addreses and Informations only from his Parliament or Committee of Estate: To whom in the mean time he recommended the ordering and preparing of that affair, and to whom alone any of his People that were interest'd, might freely and should only make their applications, assuring them, that his own Honour once vindicated, and the ancient Prerogatives of the Crown asserted, he would grant such a full and free Pardon, and Act of Indemnity, as might witness, that he desired nothing more than that his People should be settled with abundance of Happiness, Peace, and Plenty, under his Government.

For the Government of Ireland, he made Sir Maurice Eustace Knight, Lord Chancellour of Ireland, Roger Earl of Orrery Lord President of Munster, and Charles Earl of Mouraith, Lord President of Connaught to be Justices, who Govern'd Affairs there with great Candor and Moderation.

E The Sitting again of the Parliament of England, drew very near, in the Interim whereof, the King, to manifest his vigilance for the good of his Subjects, according to his Promise at their Adjournment the latter end of October, published his Declaration concerning Ecclesiastical Affairs, fill'd with many gracious Concessions to allay the distempers in Religion of that time; which because it was but temporary, till the Parliament should Offer something further to him in reference to those matters, We forbear to mention the particulars thereof. He likewise a few days after emitted a Commission under the Great Seal of England, to several Persons of great Honour and Integrity, to Treat with all Purchasers of Crown and Church-Lands, that none of his People might want any satisfaction which in reason could be allowed them.

The Two Houses of Parliament met the Sixth of November, and applied themselves to the making of several Laws for the augmentation of the King's Revenue, and other Matters of great Consideration, in which they were the more diligent and speedy, for that they received Intimation from the King, That he intended to Dissolve them on the 29th of December: In the mean time, They Ordered, That the several Bodies of Oliver Cromwell, John Bradshaw, Henry Ireton, and Thomas Pride, should be taken out of their Graves, and drawn on an Hurdle to Tyburn, to be buried under the Gallows: And on Christmas-Eve, the King went to the House of Lords, and there gave his Royall Assent to Two Acts of Parliament; viz. To an Act for a Grant of certain Impositions upon Beer, Ale, and other Liquors, for the increase of his Majestie's Revenue; and, an Act for the taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries, and Tenures in Capite and by Knights Service, and Purveyance, and for settling a Revenue upon his Majestie in Lieu thereof.

G The Act for a Grant of certain Impositions, &c. is by several Rates as Excise, upon Beer, Ale, Sider, Perry, Metheglin, Strong-Water or Aqua-Vita, Coffee, Chocolate, Sherbet, and Tea; (viz.) for Beer, Ale, and such of these as are not Foreign Liquors, they are to be paid by the Brewer or other person that shall sell the same; And all Foreign Liquors, by the Merchant, or Importer in ready Money upon Entry, made before the Landing thereof; And these Impositions are to continue by this Law during the King's Life: But by another Statute made the same Session, For taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries, and Tenures in Capite, and by Knights Service, vice, and Purveyance, and for settling a Revenue upon his Majesty in lieu thereof: The said Impositions and Rates are in recompence thereof to be paid to his Majesty, his Heirs and Successors for ever.

The Reasons alledged in this Statute, for taking away the Courts of Wards, in the Preamble thereof, were, Because Tenures by Knights Service, either of the King or others, or by Knights service in Capite, or by Socage in Capite of the King, and the Consequents upon the same had been much more burthensome, grievous, and prejudicial to the Kingdom, than beneficial to the King: And since the intermission of the said Court from the 24th. of February, 1645. many persons had by Will and otherwise made disposal of their Lands held by Knights Service, whereupon divers Questions might arise, unless some seasonable Remedy should be taken to prevent the same, by taking away from the said 24th day of February, 1645. the Court of Wards and Liveries, and all Wardships, Liveries, Primer Seisins, and all Onser le mains, Values, and Forfeitures of Marriages, by reason of any Tenure of the King, or of any other by Knight Service, and all mean Rates and Gifts, Grants or Charges &c.

The Death of the Princess of Anjou.

The Parliament Dissolv'd, and 32 Acts more pass'd by the King.

While the King was passing these Two Acts, his Sister the Princess Mary, Princess of Anjou, died at White-Hall, A Lady of admirable Virtues and all Princely Endowments; and Five days after (viz.) on the 29th day of December in the Evening (which was the day of the Dissolution of the Parliament) was buried in King Henry the Seventh's Chappell at Westminster.

25th day of April 1660. by any person or persons aforesaid, in trust and for the benefit of any other person or persons not being of the Offenders aforesaid, shall be impeached, defeated, made void or frustrated hereby, or by the Convictions or Attainders aforesaid, but shall be enjoyed by the Purchasers, Grantees, Lessees, their Heirs, Executors, Administrators, and Assigns respectively, as if this Act had not been made; So as the said Conveyances, Grants, Assurances, which are and ought to be held and enjoyed as aforesaid before the First of January 1662. be enter'd and enrolled of Record in the Exchequer, and not otherwise.

5. All and singular the Mannors, Lands and Hereditaments, which heretofore were the Lands &c. of Henry late Marquess of Worcester, Edward now Marquess of Worcester, and Henry Lord Herbert, Son to the said Edward Marquess of Worcester, whereof the said Oliver Cromwell, or any other person in trust for him, or to his use, or any other the persons attainted by this Act or otherwise, or any other person in trust for them or any of them, had at any time before or since the decease of the said Oliver Cromwell, are vested and seised in, and shall be held and enjoyed by the said Marquess of Worcester, and Henry Lord Herbert, in such manner, and for such Estates or such Powers and Privileges, as they formerly had in the same, Saving the Estates, Rights, Titles and Interests of Strangers, not derived by and from any of the said Offenders since the 25th day of March, 1646.

1. It is Provided nevertheless, That those who have received any of the Rents or Mean Profits of, in, or out of, any the Lands, Chattels Real, or Possessions of any of the Offenders in this Act mentioned, before the 11th of February 1659. and have paid or accounted for the same before that day unto the said offender or offenders, or their Assigns, or any other person claiming from or under them, shall be for ever acquitted and discharged of and from the same, against the King, his Heirs and Successors.

2. And also, That Richard Ingoldsby may keep, sell or dispose of all the Goods and Chattels formerly belonging to Sir Hardress Waller in Ireland, until 2000 l. (for which the said Ingoldsby in the Year 1658. stood jointly bounden with the said Sir Hardress Waller unto James Brooks of the City of York Alderman, and was then counter-secured by a Judgement upon his Lands, and since by a Deed of Bargain and Sale of the said Goods and Chattels in Ireland,) be fully paid, together with the Interest thereof; the said Ingoldsby paying the Over-plus to the King.

The King's Favour to this Gentleman, grounded upon so notable a foundation of Merit, as is before related, did oblige the Parliament in this and many other occasions, to shew their respect to him.

The Act for raising and establishing a Post-Office, brought a Revenue of One and Twenty Thousand Pounds a Year to the Crown; which was an Improvement first made in the time of Cromwell's Usurpation.

The Act for the better Ordering of the Selling of Wines by Retail, was to Prohibit any from selling of Wines, but such as should be Licenc'd by the King's Agents; and from retailing mingled, corrupted or abused Wines: as also for Limiting and bringing down the Prices thereof.

The Act for the prohibiting the planting, setting or sowing of Tobacco in England and Ireland, Did under strict penalties forbid the setting or planting any Tobacco in seed, plant, or otherwise, in England, Wales, the Island of Jersey and Guernsey, and the Town of Bernick, except it be in any Physick-Garden of either of the Universities, or other private Garden for Physick or Surgery, so as the quantity so planted, exceed not one half of a Pole in any Place or Garden.

The Act for prohibiting the Exportation of Wooll, Woolfells, Fullers-Earth, or any kind of Scouring Earth, was made to preserve the Manufacture of Woollen Cloth in England, which was one of the Staple-Commodities of this Kingdom, and that which brought most Trade and Advantage of any to it, till of late years that the Hollanders, French, and others of our Neighbours, by Exportation of our Materials, had almost gain'd all the Trade thereof from Us: And although these Materials, as Wooll, Woolfells, and Fullers-Earth, had been by former Laws prohibited to be Exported to any Foreign Parts, on pain of Forfeiture or other pecuniary Mults. Those Laws could not prevent the offences, for they were frequently, by stealth, or connivance, Exported. Wherefore this Statute was thought fit to be made, for the re-inforcing of those former Laws, and preventing the like abuses for the future.

After the King had given the Royall Assent to the before mentioned Acts, he made a Speech to both Houses, full of gracious and pleasing Expressions: And amongst others, he said, This Parliament should be called to all Posterity, The Healing and the Blessed Parliament. And that it should be a Rule to his Actions and Counsellors to consider, What is a Parliament like to think of this Action, or this Council? Adding, That he would Religiously himself observe the Act of Indemnity, and would exact the Observation of it from all others.

And

And after he had ended, The Lord Chancellor (according to the Custome, for none ever in his Place had greater Eloquence) excellently set forth the Happiness of the King and his People, which only strove which should express more affection to each others to the Joy of all his good Subjects, and the Terror of Evil Doers. And with this Speech he concluded the Parliament; for then it was Dissolved. And We may truly say, Never did King and Parliament in this Kingdom better agree; never was there any Parliament Assembled with greater Expectation, and ended with greater Satisfaction to all the People; Of which we may not improperly insert in this place a Speech, out of that Excellent Ode, upon the King's Restoration and Return, made by the most Celebrated of our English Poets now living, a little before its Dissolution; in the 18th Page whereof, is sung this Passage, I desire to be remembered.

And ill should we deserve this Happy Day,
If we do not upbraid our former Ignominy;
You Great Patriots of the Two
Most truly other Houses now;
Who have redeem'd from Harred and from Shame,
A Parliament's once Venerable Name;
And now the Title of a House restore
To that which was but Slaughter-House before.
If my advice, Ye Worthies, might be take Within those Reverend Places,
Which now your Flying Presence graces,
Your worthy Statues always should remain,
To keep alive your great Memory,
And to your Successors an Example be
Of Truth, Religion, Reason, Loyalty;
For though we firmly Protest Peace
May shortly make the Publick Labours cease,
The grateful Nation, will with joy consent,
That in this Senate, you should be seated (Though yet the Name sounds with some dread)
To be the Long, the Endless Parliament.

Of all the manifold Sects, and Separations, that sprang up from the licence of the late War, and the Anarchy that reign'd from that time, till the time of his Majesty's Restoration, there were scarce any that dreaded not the Name of Monarchy, as apprehending the Consequence thereof to be a tendency to Uniformity in Church and State; And therefore no marvel if they who heretofore were profess'd Enemies to the King and his Right of Government, were, after his Coming in, agitated with a restless spirit of Impatience and Dissatisfaction, which forbore not several times to manifest it self in such Attempts, as had not a timely stop been put unto them, by the Prudent Foresight and vigilant Care of his Majesty and his Council; might very much have endanger'd the Embroyling of the Nation in a new Civil War. The first Alarm that was given, was by the Fifth Monarchy-men, (they at least were the only hardy men that openly appear'd) a generation of people; however so call'd, the most Invererate Enemies, to the Ancient settled Monarchy of the Nation, of all the whole Hydra; Of these about 50 or 60 mad persons, resolving to venture Neck or nothing, broke forth into open Hostility and Rebellion, under the Conduct of one Thomas Venner, a Cooper, that had lived for some time in New-England, and was of the principle of the Fifth Monarchy, and a Preacher to a Conventicle of those of that Opinion, who usually met in Coleman-street. That which first gave him and his partakers a pretence to their Treason, was the Oath of Allegiance and Supremacy, (which all good Subjects are oblig'd by the Law to take) exclaiming not only against them in particular, but against all Oaths in general; And when some amongst them, more Ingenious than the rest, advised their Companions not to dispute what was Commanded by their Superiours, since subjection was naturally due to those Powers from whence they expected protection; They were answered by the Seditious, That they had no protection in the exercise of their Religion, but were for the practice thereof expos'd to all manner of Contempts and Miseries. As if a Just Restraint from Extravagancies in Divine Worship, were to be esteem'd Oppression.

The madness of these Men extended so far, as to believe they and the rest of their Judgment were called by GOD to Reform the World, and make all the Earthly Powers (which they call'd Babylon) subservient to the Kingdom of King Jesus; and in order thereunto, never to sheath their Swords; till the carnal Powers of the World became a hissing and a Curse: And by a misguided Zeal; they were so confident in their undertaking, that they were taught and believ'd one should subdue a Thousand, making account when they had led Captive Captivity in England, to go into France, Spain, Germany, and other parts of the World, there to prosecute their holy design.

The place where they consulted and continued their Conspiracy, was the Meeting-place for their Devotion, and thither they had at several times conveyed Arms. On Sunday the Sixth of January, which was the day before their Execution, (his Majesty at that time being gone to accompany his Royall Mother the Queen-Dowager of Great Brittain, and his Sister the Princess Henrietta Maria, part of their Journey toward France,) they were very late at their Assembly, which made one Martin, the Landlord of the House, but not of their Party, somewhat inquisitive after their doings; and as he was going into the Chamber to them, he met Penny, who seeing him troubled, told him; He perceiv'd he thought they stay too long; and that in half an hour's space after they had fought God in their Prayers, they would disperse. Martin's Jealousie of their Actions, made him Consult with a Friend about their unusual manner of Assembling; and he was advis'd to listen at their Door, or peep through some Chink to hear or see what they were about; Which he did, and found them Arming themselves with Backs, Breast, and Head-Pieces; and thereupon he immediately gave Notice thereof to some of the next Officers. But within half an hour of this, they came down, and being met by the Mistress of the House great with Child, who in amazement would have shut the Door upon them, they offer'd to shoot her with a Musquet; upon which in great terror she left them. The Rebels first march'd to St. Thomas Apostle's, to call some of their party, and from thence to Bishop's Gate, and after to White-Cross-street. Sir Richard Brown, the Lord Mayor, having notice of their being abroad, got together some Files of the Trained Bands, but not sufficient, as was supposed, to make any impression upon them; they being imagin'd more numerous than they were; by which means they had opportunity to escape to St. John's Wood, and from thence to Cantrells, Benning High-Gate and Hampstead.

By this time the Alarm being come to White-Hall, and the Generall's Regiment drawn the Duke of York, and he up, with the Earl of Oxford and some others, and some of the Guards, march'd into London, where they were inform'd all the Rebels were dispersed, except a party of them that were seen to go towards Cath-Way, whither Sir Thomas Sandy was sent with some of the Guards, and a Company of Foot. But by the darkness of the Night they got away, and on Wednesday Morning came again into London, and divided themselves into two Parties, one whereof about 5, and 6, in the Morning appear'd about Leaden-Hall, and from thence march'd to Little Eastcheap, where they fought obstinately enough, but were dispersed by the Train'd Bands. Vener and another Party came to my Lord Mayor's House, thinking to have taken him Prisoner; but missing him, they march'd into Woodstreet, where they were met by Colonel Corbet and about Twenty Horse; Corbet and some of his party Charged through the Rebels, and broke them, where by the Train'd Band Foot that seconded them, had little more to do, than to pursue them. They fought with Courage to admiration; and if they had not been hinder'd by the care of the Lord Mayor from increasing their numbers, a Thousand men to resist 10, might have caus'd such a disturbance in the City, as might have had an influence much further. Vener himself was very much wounded before he was taken, and about Five or Six kill'd that refus'd Quarter; of which some of them were so obscure, that their Names were not known. And about eight or ten days after, Vener with about Sixteen or Seventeen of the most notorious, were arraigned at Justice-Hall in the Old-Baily, found guilty, and executed in several parts of London.

Thus ended this desperate Enterprize of a formidable Army of Threecore men, who were insensated to that height of Enthusiastick Valour, that they thought themselves strong enough to encounter the whole Armed force of one of the Greatest and most Populous Cities of the World; The Prince's Guards, the Generall's Troops, the City Train'd Bands, were all swallow'd up in Conceit, by these men of Mickle Might, and little Wit: and I have heard say, they were so insatuated with their golden Dreams, and so Cocksure of success, that they had promis'd to themselves the Partage of the whole Empire of the World among them; Thirsty being design'd for the subduing of the Eastern Parts, and Thirty of the Western: But we have seen what disaster they met with by the Way.

With the Suppression of this Insurrection, and the bringing the Authors thereof to exemplary punishment, together with the decease of Sir Arthur Haslerigg in the Tower, who is thought to have died with very Anguish of Mind, to see all his great Designs in an Instant brought to nothing, and himself at the Mercy of a Power he had so long Triumph'd in. We shall conclude this Year, as with the Solemn Coronation of his Majesty; our present History not thinking it enough to have seen him, restor'd to his Throne and rightful Inheritance, without seeing him also Invested with those Ensigns, and Formalities of Regal Dignity, by which all his Predecessors were confirm'd and establish'd Kings of England.

The Poms and Proceedings whereof, in regard they may very well be conceiv'd to have exceeded the Magnificences of all former Coronations, as being perform'd for a PRINCE so miraculously restor'd to his People. We judge not impertinent to be here Inferred; following herein the Observations and Collection (according to the Original unamulいた Copy set forth by himself, and with his own Name prefix'd to the Title) of Elias Ashmole Esq; Windsor Herald at Arms; a most Judicious and Curious Inquirer into all Antiquities of this Nature, and exactly vers'd in the publick Ceremonies of State, especially in the Rites and Customs of the most Noble and Illustrious Order of the Garter: The Names and Order of the Companions whereof, as they were settled in their Stalls the 16th of April, 1661. were as followeth:

The Proceedings on the day of his MAJESTIE'S Coronation were as followeth:

Upon the 23<sup>d</sup> of April, being St. George's Day, about half an hour after seven in the Morning, the King entred into His Rich Barge, took Water from the Privy-Stairs at White-Hall, and landed at the Parliament-Stairs: From whence He proceeded up to the Room behind the Lords-House, called the Prince's Lodgings, where, after He had repoled Himself for a while, He was arrayed in His Royal Robes of Crimson Velvet, furr'd with Ermine: By which time the Nobility, being assembled, rold themselves in the Lords-House, and Painted-Chamber.

The Judges also, with those of the Long-Robe, the Knights of the Bath, and Gentlemen of the Privy-Chamber, met in the Court of Requests.

After some space, the Kings, Heralds, and Pursuivants, began to set the Proceeding in Order, each of them taking his share assigned in Chapter, (held at the Heralds-Office the Evening before) and thence directed all the before-mentioned Degrees (except the Nobility) down into Westminster-Hall, where the rest of the Proceeding attended, and from whence the March began.

About half an hour after Nine, the Nobility (having been first called over in the Painted-Chamber) proceeded each according to his Rank, and Dignity, in their Robes, and Coronets, before the King, through the Court of Requests, into Westminster-Hall, ascended up to the State, which was raised at the West-end, and placed themselves upon each side thereof.

His Majesty being set in his Chair, under a rich Cloth of State: First, Sir Gilbert Talbot, the Master of the Jewel-House, presented the Sword of State, as also the Sword called Curiana; and two other Swords, to the Lord High-Constable, who took and delivered them to the Lord High Chamberlain, and he (having drawn the last) laid them upon the Table before the King.

Then the said Master of the Jewel-House delivered likewise the Spurs to the Lord High Constable; and he again the same to the Lord High Chamberlain, who also placed them upon the Table.

Immediately after the Dean and Prebends of Westminster, (by whom the Regalia had been brought in Procession from the Abbey-Church unto Westminster-Hall) being vested in rich Copes, proceeded from the lower end thereof, in manner following:

The Serjeant of the Vestry, in a Scarlet Mantle. The Children of the King's Chappel, being twelve in number, in Scarlet Mantles. The Quire of Westminster in Surplices. The Gentleman of the King's Chappel, being thirty three in number, in Scarlet Mantles. The Pursuivants, Heralds, and Provincial Kings. The Dean, carrying St. Edward's Crown. Doctour Helya, the Scepter with the Cross. Doctour Heywood, the Scepter with the Dove. Doctour Nicholas, the Orb with the Cross. Doctour Killegrev, King Edward's Staff. Doctour Jones, the Chalice, and Patena. Doctour Dowry, the Spoon. Doctour Busby, the Ampulla.

All standing towards the lower end of the Hall, ready to proceed, they made their first Reverence together; then coming to the middle of the said Hall, they there made a second; and thence going a litle further, both the Quires fell off, and stood on either side, through which Lane, the Pursuivants, Heralds, and Kings passing, fell likewise off on either side, the Seniors still placing themselves uppermost towards the Throne: after whom, the Dean and Prebends proceeded, and arrived at the foot of the Stone-Steps, ascending to the Throne, where they made another Reverence.

This being done, the Dean and Prebends, with Garter, Principal King of Arms before them, (he having waited their coming thither) ascended the Steps, and approaching near to the Table before the King, made their last Reverence.

The Dean first presented the Crown, which was by the Lord High Constable, and Lord Great Chamberlain, set upon the Table; who afterwards took from each of the Prebends that part of the Regalia, which they carried, and laid them also by the Crown: which done, they retired.

Then, the Lord Great Chamberlain presenting the Regalia severally to the King, His Majesty thereupon disposed of them unto the Noble-men hereafter named, to be carried by them in the Proceeding to the Abbey-Church, viz.

St. Edward's Staff to the Earl of Sandwich. The Spurs to the Earl of Penbroke, and Montgomery. The Scepter with the Cross to the Earl of Bedford. The Painted Sword (born on the left hand of Curiana) to the Earl of Derby. The Pointed Sword (born on the right hand thereof) to the Earl of Shrewsbury. The Sword called Curiana to the Earl of Oxford. The Sword of State to the Earl of Manchester. The Scepter with the Dove to the Duke of Albemarle.

St. Edward's Crown to the Duke of Ormond.

All things being thus prepared, and it being about Ten a Clock, the Proceeding began from out the said Hall into the Palace-Tard, through the Gate-House, and the end of King's-street, thence along the Great Sanctuary, and so to the West-end of the Abbey-Church, where upon Blew Cloth, which was spread upon the Ground, from the Throne in Westminster-Hall, to the great Steps in the Abbey-Church, by Sir George Carteret Knight, Vice-Chamberlain, appointed by the King to be his Almoner for this Day.

When the Proceeding had entred the Abbey-Church, all passed through the Quire, and thence went up the Stairs toward the great Stage, and, as they arrived at the top thereof, were disposed by the Heralds into two Galleries, built on either side the upper end of the Quire.

That, on the North side, received the Aldermen of London, the Judges, and Gentlemen of the Long-Robe, the Quire of Westminster, the Gentlemen and Children of the King's Chappell, (excepting twelve Gentlemen, four Children, and one Organist, who went into a Gallery, raised on the South-side of the Upper Quire, peculiarly appointed for them;) and, in the Gallery, on the South-side, were seated the Knights of the Bath, and Gentlemen of the Privy-Chamber.

The King, being entred the West-Door of the Abbey-Church, was received with an Anthem, begun by the Quire of Westminster; who, with the Dean, and Prebends, had before fallen off from the Proceeding, a little on the left hand of the middle file, and stayed there to attend His coming, where also a Fold-stool, and Cushions were laid ready for His Majesty to kneel at.

The Anthem sung was the first, fourth, fifth, and sixth Verses of the 122<sup>d</sup> Psalm:

I was glad when they said unto me, we will go into the House of the Lord, &c.

The King, arriving at the Fold-stool, kneeled down, and used some private Ejaculations; which being finished, He thence proceeded into, and through the Quire, up to the great Theatre (erected close to the four high Pillars, standing between the Quire and the Altar) upon which the Throne of Estate was placed, (being a Square raised on five Degrees) at the Entrance whereof were set a Chair, Foot-stool, and Cushion, covered with Cloth of Gold, whereon He reposed Himself.

Immediately after the Bishop of London (who was appointed to Officiate, in part, that Day, for the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, whose age and weakness rendered him incapable of performing his whole Duty at the Coronation) having the Lord High-Constable, the Earl Marshal, the Lord Great Chamberlain, the Lord High-Chancellor, and Lord Chamberlain of the Household before him, went first to the South, next to the West, and lastly, to the North-side of the Theatre; and at every of the said three sides, acquainted the People, That he presented to them King CHARLES, the rightful Inheritor of the Crown of this Realm; and asked them, If they were willing to do their Homage, Service, and Bounden Duty to Him.

As this was doing, the King rose up, and stood by the aforesaid Chair, turning His Face full to that side of the Stage, where the said Bishop stood, when he spake to the People; who signified their willingness, by loud Shouts, and Acclamations.

The same Question was likewise put by the said Bishop to all the Nobility present.

Immediately after, this following Anthem was sung by the Gentlemen of the King's Chappell:

Let thy Hand be strengthened, and thy right Hand be exalted. Let Justice and Judgment be the Preparation of thy Seat, and Mercy and Truth go before thy Face.

In which time, a large Carpet was spread by a Groom and Page of the removing Wardrobe, from the Altar, down below the half Faces thereof, and over that a Silk Carpet, and Cushion, laid by the Gentleman-Usher of the Black-Rod, and Mr. Kinnsley: whereupon the Bishop of London went down from the Stage towards the Altar, and, having made his Reverence, placed Himself at the North-side thereof.

Then the King descended from His Throne, and proceeded towards the Altar, being supported by the Bishops of Duresme, and Bath and Wells, with the Four Swords, the grand Officers, the Noblemen, and Bishops, that carried the Regalia before Him, the Dean of Westminster also attending. Being arrived at the Steps of the Altar, He kneeled down upon the Cushion, there laid ready for Him; him, having first offered the Pall, (which was of Cloth of Gold, and born by the Earl of Sandwich) as also a Wedge of Gold of a pound weight, (presented unto His Hands by the Lord Cornwallis, Treasurer of His Household) both which were received from the King by the Bishop of London, who laid them reverently upon the Altar. Immediately after, His Majesty retired to a Chair of State, set on the South-side of the Altar, a little below the Traverse of Crimson Taffety. After this, the Bishops, and Noble-men, that carried the Regalia, drew near to the Altar, and presented every particular to the said Bishop of London, who placed them also upon the Altar; and having so done, they retired to their Seats. Whereupon the King kneeled at a Fald-stool (set on the right sides of his Chair of State) whilst the Bishop of London said this Prayer.

O God, which dost visit those, that are humble, and dost comfort us by thy Holy Spirit, send down thy Grace upon this thy Servant CHARLES, that by Him we may feel thy Presence among us, through Jesus Christ, Amen.

This Prayer ended, the Bishop of Worcester went up into the Pulpit, placed on the North-side of the Altar, opposite to the King, and began his SERMON, the Text being taken out of the 28th Chapter of the Proverbs, and the second Verse.

From the beginning of the aforesaid Offering to this time the KING was bare, but now He put on His Cap, made of Crimson Velvet, turn'd up with Ermings: with which He face covered all the Sermon-time.

On the King's right hand stood the Bishop of Durresme, and beyond him the Noble-men, that carried the Swords, who held them naked, and erect. The Duke of York sat a little behind Him on His left hand; next to whom stood the Bishop of Bath and Wells, together with the Lord Great Chamberlain.

The Lord High Chancellor, and Lord High Treasurer, sat on a Form behind the Duke of York; and behind them, in a Gallery, sat the Duchess of York.

In the same Gallery also were placed.

Baron Bateville, Ordinary Ambassador from Spain.

Prince Maurice of Nassau, Extraordinary Ambassador from the Elector of Brandenburgh.

The Count Coningsmark, Envoy from Sweden.

Monsieur Frisendorf, Resident of Sweden.

Monsieur Patcon, Resident of Denmark.

Monsieur Plessis Belliere, Envoy from Monsieur the Duke of Orleans.

Signieur Gjavarina, Resident of Venice. Signieur Bernardi, Resident of Genoa.

An Envoy from the Cardinal of Hesse.

The Marquess de Montbrun, with several other Gentlemen-strangers.

But, Don Francisco de Mello, the Ambassador of Portugal, was placed in the Lord Chamberlain's Box.

On the North-side of the Altar sat the Bishop of London, directly opposite to the King in the Arch-Bishops Chair, covered with Purple Velvet: the rest of the Bishops were placed on Forms behind him.

And higher, towards St. Edward's Chappel, stood Garter, Principal King of Arms, with the Officers of the standing and moving Ward-robes, viz. Mr. Rumbal, and Mr. Townsend, and Mr. Kinnerley, in Scarlet Gowns; having a Crown embroidered with Gold on their left Sleeves; the Groom and Page of the Ward-robe having Scarlet Gowns also, but not the Badg of the Crown; the Serjeant of the Vestry with his gilt Verge; and other Vergers: with them also stood Mr. Ashburnham, Mr. Seymour, Mr. Elliot, Mr. Progers, and Mr. Chiffinch, with some other of the King's Servants, who attended to do Service.

Opposite to them, on the South-side of the Altar, stood the Dean and Prebends of Westminster. St. Edward's ancient Chair, (covered all over with Cloth of Gold) was placed upon the North-side of the Altar, a little lower then that belonging to the Arch-Bishop, but something nearer the middle of the Isle, and between the King's Chair of State and the Pulpit.

Near the Pulpit stood the Master of the Jewel-House, and the Lord Mayor of London. The Nobility, not formerly named, (who were seated upon Forms round about the in-side of the Stage) when Sermon began, drew near to that side thereof, which faced the High Altar, and stood there.

On the Corners of the Stage, near the High Altar, adjoining to the two uppermost Pillars, were Places raised in for the Provincial Kings, Heralds, and Pursuivants.

The Serjeants at Arms, being sixteen in number, stood with their Maces on their Shoulders, within the Rails, on either side the Entrance of the Stage from the Quire.

Over the Door, and at the West-end of the Quire, stood the Drums, and Trumpets.

Sermon being ended, the King uncovered His Head, and immediately the Bishop of London arose from his Seat, and drew near to the King's Chair of State, and asked Him His willingness to take the usual Oath to confirm the Laws to the People, and namely the Franchises granted to the Clergy by St. Edward the Confessor, to maintain the Gospel established in the Kingdom, to keep Peace, execute Justice, and grant the Commons the rightful Customs: unto every of which Questions His Majesty made particular Answers, That He would.

A Then the Bishop of Rockester read the Bishop's Petition to the King; the Prayer whereof was, That He would preserve unto them, and the Churches committed to their Charge, all Canonical Privileges, due Law, and Justice, and protect, and defend Them, and the Churches, under their Government: Which his Majesty most graciously by a large Answer (which repeated the words of the Petition) granted, and promised to perform.

Afterwards the King, assisted by the Bishops of Durresme, and Bath and Wells, was led from his Chair up to the Altar (the Sword of State being born before Him, and the Lord Great Chamberlain attending) where He took an Oath to perform, and keep what He had promised.

Which Oath taken, the King was led in like manner back to His Chair of State, and immediately the Bishop of London begun the Hymn, Come Holy Ghost, eternal God, &c. the Quires singing the rest of it.

And a little before the ending thereof, the Fald-stool was set again at the King's right Hand; whereat (as soon as the Hymn was finished) He kneeled, the Bishop of London standing before him, and saying the following Prayer.

We beseech thee, O Lord, Holy Father, Almighty, and everlasting God, for This thy Servant Charles, &c.

The Prayer ended, the Bishop of London went to the North-side of the Altar, the King still kneeling, and forthwith the Bishops of Peterborough, and Gloucester, went, and kneeled on the upper huilt-pice of the Altar, where they began the Letany, the Quires singing the Responses; the Dean of Westminster kneeling all the while at the King's left Hand.

After the Letany followed three Prayers, said by the Bishop of London at the North-side of the Altar; and, a little before the last of them was ended, the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury came out at the North-door of St. Edward's Chappel, vested in a rich, ancient Cope.

At the ending of the third Prayer, the said Archbishop standing before the Altar, began the Versicle, Lift up your Hearts.

Resp.

We lift them up to the Lord.

Arch-Bishop.

Let us give thanks unto the Lord our God.

Resp.

It is meet and right so to do.

Arch-Bishop.

It is very meet, and right, and our bounden duty, that we should at all times, and in all places, give thanks unto thee, O Lord, Holy Father, &c.

This Preface being finish'd, the King arose from before the Fald-stool, and went to the Altar, supported by the aforesaid Bishops of Durresme, and Bath and Wells: where He was disrobed by the Lord Great Chamberlain of His Royal Robes, which were immediately carried thence into the Traverse erected in St. Edward's Chappel.

Whilst this was in doing, the Chair, that was before placed at the entrance of the Stage, was removed, and set on the North-side of the Altar, betwixt it, and St. Edward's Chair, whereunto the King came, sat down, and was anointed by the said Arch-Bishop, (while the Dean of Westminster held the Ampulla, and poured the Oyl out into the Spoon) first in the Palms of both His Hands, in manner of a Cross; the Arch-Bishop, as he anointed him, pronouncing these words, Let these Hands be anointed with Holy Oyl, as Kings and Prophets have been anointed, and as Samuel did anoint David to be King; that Thou mayst be blessed, and established KING in this Kingdom, and this People, whom the Lord Thy God hath given thee to rule over: which he vouchsafe to grant, who, with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, Three in Person, and One in Unitie, be blessed, and praised, now, and for evermore. Amen.

After which, the Quire sung this Anthem,

Sadoc the Priest, and Nathan the Prophet anointed Solomon King, and all the People rejoiced, and said, God saw the KING.

At the end of which Anthem, the Arch-Bishop said this Prayer, Look down, Almighty God, with thy favourable Countenance upon This Glorious KING, &c.

1661.

Which being done, the Anointing was dried up with fine Linen, and the Loops of His Shirt closed up by the Dean of Westminster, and then the Arch-Bishop said these two Prayers, A
God, the Son of God, Christ Jesus our Lord, who is anointed of his Father with the oyl of Gladness above his fellows, &c. God, which art the Glory of the Righteous, and the Mercy of Sinners, &c.

During the time of Unction, a rich Pall of Cloth of Gold (brought from the great Ward-robe by Mr. Kumball) was held over the King's Head by the Dukes of Buckingham and Albemarle, the Earls of Berks and Sandwich, as Knights of the most Noble Order of the Garter.

After these Prayers, the Lord Great Chamberlain delivered the Coffe to the Arch-Bishop, who put it on the King's Head, and immediately after, the Dean of Westminster put the Coif, with the Colobium Sindonis, or Surplice upon the King: whereupon the Arch-Bishop said this short Prayer, B

O God, the King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, by whom Kings do reign, and Lawgivers do make good Laws, vouchsafe, we beseech thee, in thy favour, to bless this Kingly Ornament, and grant, that thy Servant Charles, our King, who shall wear it, may shine in thy sight with the Ornament of a good Life, and holy Actions; and, after this life ended, He may for ever enjoy that Life, and Glory, which hath no end, through Christ our Lord. Amen.

This said, the Dean of Westminster, having likewise fetched the Tissue-Hose and Sandals from the Altar, he arrayed the King therewith; as also with the Super-tunica, or close Pall of Cloth of Gold, and girded the same about Him.

But the Taffetyed Shirt was not made use of at all.

After all this, the said Dean took the Spurs from off the Altar, and delivered them to the Lord Great Chamberlain, who touched the King's Heels therewith, and forthwith sent them back to the Altar.

Then the Arch-Bishop received the Sword of State in the Scabbard from the Lord Chamberlain of the Household, and laid it upon the Altar, saying this Prayer, Hear our Prayers, we beseech thee, O Lord, and vouchsafe by thy right hand of Majesty, to bless, and sanctifie this Sword, wherewith thy Servant Charles desireth to be girt, that it may be a Defence, and Protection of Churches, Widows, and Orphans, and all the Servants of God, against the savage cruelty of Pagans, and Infidels; and that it may be a Fear and Terrour to all those that lie in wait to do mischief, through Christ our Lord. Amen.

This Prayer finished, the Arch-Bishop and Bishops assisting, delivered the Sword back to the King, saying, Accipe gladium per manus Episcoporum.

Whereupon, the Lord Great Chamberlain girt it about the King, and the Arch-Bishop said,

Receive this Kingly Sword, which is hallowed for the defence of the Holy Church, and delivered unto Thee by the hands of the Bishops, though unworthy, yet consecrated by the authority of the holy Apostles, &c.

After this, the Dean of Westminster took the * Armit, made of Cloth of Tissue, (brought thither by Mr. Kumball, on the behalf of the Earl of Sandwich, Master of the great Ward-robe) and put it about the King's Neck, and tyed it to the bowings of His Arms, the Arch-Bishop standing before the King, with the Bishop of London, on his right Hand, and saying,

Receive the Armit of sincerity, and wisdom, as a Token of God's embracing, whereby all Thy works may be defended against Thine Enemies, both bodily, and Ghostly, through Christ our Lord.

Next the Mantle, or open Pall, made of Cloth of Gold, and lined with red Taffety, was put upon Him by the said Dean; the Arch-Bishop likewise using the words of Signification, viz.

Receive this Pall, which is formed with four Corners, to let Thee understand, that the four Corners of the World are subject to the Power of God; and that no Man can happily reign upon the Earth, who hath not received his authority from Heaven.

In the next place, the Arch-Bishop took Saint Edward's Crown, and blessed it, saying,

God, the Crown of the Faithful, &c. bless, and sanctifie this Crown, that as the same is adorned with divers precious Stones, so This thy Servant, that weareth it, may be filled with thy manifold Graces of all precious Vertues, through the King eternal, thy Son our Lord. Amen.

In the mean time, St. Edward's Chair was removed into the middle of the Isle, and set right over against the Altar, whither the King went, and sat down in it, and then the Arch-Bishop brought St. Edward's Crown from the Altar, and put it upon His Head.

Whereupon, all the People, with loud and repeated shouts, cried, God save the KING; and, by a Signal then given, the great Ordinance from the Tower were also shot off.

At

A At the ceasing of these Acclamations, the Arch-Bishop went on, saying,

God crown Thee with a Crown of Glory, and Righteousness, with the honour and work of Fortitude, that Thou by Thy Ministrie, having a Right Faith and manifold fruit of good Works, mayst obtain the Crown of an everlasting Kingdom, by the gift of him, whose Kingdom endureth for ever. Amen.

Adding therunto this Prayer,

*O God of Eternity, &c. Bless This thy Servant, who * boweth His Head unto thy Majesty, &c.*

B After the Prayer, the Arch-Bishop read the Comfortare,

Be strong, and of a good Courage, and observe the Commandments of the Lord, to walk in his ways, &c.

And the mean while, the Quires sung this Anthem,

And the King shall rejoice in thy strength, O Lord. Exceeding glad shall He be of thy Salvation, &c.

C Upon this, the Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, and Viscounts put on their Coronets; the Barons their Caps; and divers of them came and stood about the KING, who still sat in St. Edward's Chair.

Mr. Garter and the Provincial Kings put on their Crowns, also.

Then the Master of the Jewel-House delivered to the Arch-Bishop the Ring, who consecrated it, after this manner, saying,

Bless, O Lord, and sanctifie this Ring, that Thy Servant, wearing it, may be sealed with the Ring of Faith, and by the Power of the Highest be preserved from sin, and let all the Blessings, which are found in Holy Scripture, plentifully descend upon Him; that whatsover He shall sanctifie, may be holy; and whatsoever He bless, may be blessed. Amen.

After which, he put it upon the fourth Finger of the King's right Hand, and said,

Receive this Ring of Kingly Dignity, and by it the Seal of Catholick Faith; that as this Day Thou art adorned the Head and Prince of this Kingdom, and People, so Thou mayst persevere as the Author, and Establisher of Christianity, and the Christian Faith; that, being rich in Faith, and happy in Works, Thou mayst reign with him, that is King of Kings; to whom be Honour, and Glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

E And then began this Prayer,

O God, to whom belongeth all Power, and Dignity, give unto thy Servant Charles the Fruit of His Dignity, wherein grant He may long continue, and fear thee always, and always labour to please thee, through Christ our Lord. Amen.

When this Prayer was finished, the livery Gloves were delivered to the KING by the Lord Great Chamberlain: who, going to the Altar, ungirt his Sword, and offered it at the Altar in the Scabbard: which being rededified by the Lord Chamberlain of the Household, was drawn out of the Scabbard, and carried naked by him all the following part of the Solemnity.

F Then the Arch-Bishop took the Scepter with the Cross, from off the Altar, and delivered it into the King's right Hand, saying, Receive this Scepter, the Sign of Kingly Power, the Rod of Kingdoms, the Rod of Vertue, that Thou govern Thy Self aright, and defend the Holy Church, and Christian People committed by God unto Thy Charge, punish the Wicked, and protect the Just, and lead them in the ways of Righteousness, and that from this Temporal Kingdom Thou mayst be advanced to an Eternal Kingdom, by his Goodness, whose Kingdom is everlasting. Amen.

G While this was pronounced by the Arch-Bishop, Mr. Henry Howard delivered to the King a rich Glove, which he put on his right hand, and then received the Scepter. And after that, the Arch-Bishop said this Prayer,

O Lord, the Fountain of all good things, &c. Grant, we beseech thee, to This thy Servant Charles, that He may order aright the Dignity, which He hath obtained, &c.

1661.

* At which words the King bowed His Head.

Arm, according it was adjudged to him by the Court of Claims, by virtue of holding the Manner of Workop in the County of Nottingham. Next of all, the Arch-Bishop took the Scepter with the Dove, and gave it into the King's Hand also, saying, Receive the Rod of Vertue, and Equity, learn to make much of the Godly, and to terrise the wicked; shew the way to those that go astray, offer Thy Hand to those that fall, repress the proud, lift up the lowly, that our Lord Jesus Christ may open to Thee the Door, who saith of himself, I am the Door, by me if any man enter, he shall be safe. And let him be Thy Help, who is the Key of David, and the Scepter of the House of Israel, who openeth, and no man shutteth, who shutteth, and no man openeth; who bringeth the Captive out of Prison where he sat in darkness, and in the shadow of death, That in all things Thou mayst follow him, of whom the Prophet David saith, The Scepter of thy Kingdom is a right Scepter, thou hast loved Righteousness, and hated Iniquity; wherefore God, even thy God hath anointed thee with the Oyl of gladness above thy fellows, even Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

After which, the KING knelt, holding both the Scepter in His Hands, while the Arch-Bishop thus blessed Him,

The Lord blefs Thee, and keep Thee; and as he hath made Thee King over his People, so he will prosper Thee in this World, and in the World to come. Amen.

Then the KING arose, and set Himself again in St. Edward's Chair, while the Arch-Bishop and Bishops, present, one after another, knelt before Him, and were kissed by Him. In the mean time, the King's Chair of State, wherein He was anointed, was set above the upper Steps at the entrance upon the Theatre, whither the KING came, as He had performed the Ceremony of kissing the Bishops, having now four Swords borne naked before Him, the Arch-Bishops, Bishops, and Great Officers attending: at His arrival there, the Arch-Bishop said this Prayer, the King kneeling, Grant, O Lord, that the Clergie, and People, gathered together by thine Ordinance for this service of the KING, may by the most gracious assistance of thy goodness, and thy continual care of thy Servant our KING, be continually governed, and prospered in all happiness.

Then the KING arose, and reposed Himself in the said Chair, while both the Quire sung Te Deum.

When Te Deum was ended, the King ascended His Throne placed in the middle of the Theatre, the Swords, and Great Officers standing on either side; as also the Bishops, some in Copes, others in Rochets, the Arch-Bishop then saying, Stand, and hold fast from henceforth that Place, wherof hitherto You have been Heir by the Succession of your Fore-fathers, &c.

After this, the Bishops, and Nobility did their Homage to the King in manner following. And first the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury knelt down before the King's Knees, and said,

I, William Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, shall be Faithful, and True, and Faith, and Truth bear unto You, Our Sovereign Lord, and Your Heirs, Kings of England, and shall do, and truly acknowledge the Service of the Land, which I claim to hold of You, in the right of the Church: So help me God.

Which said, he kissed the King's left Cheek.

The like did all the other Bishops, that were present.

Then came up the Duke of York, with Garter, Principal King of Arms, before Him, and his Train born by two Gentlemen, who, being arrived at the Throne, knelt down before the King, G put off his Coronet, and did his Homage: at which the Drums beat, Trumpets sounded, and all the People shouted.

The like did the Dukes of Buckingham, and Albemarle, for themselves, and the rest of the Dukes.

So also did the Marquesses of Worcester, and Dorchester.

Next, the Earl of Oxford did homage after the same manner for himself, and all the rest of the Earls, who attended upon him to signify their contents.

After him, Viscount Hereford did the like for himself, and the rest of the Viscounts; and then the Drums beat, and Trumpets sounded again, and the People shouted.

A Lastly, Baron Audley in like manner did homage for himself, and all the Barons, who also accompanied him to the Throne, in testification of their Consents; which being finished, Drums, Trumpets, and Shouts followed.

Note, That the Words of Homage were said by every one of the Nobility, that knelt down, viz.

I, N. N. do become Your Liege-man of Life, and Limb, and of Earthly Majesty; and Faith, and Truth I shall bear unto You, to live, and die, against all manner of Folks: So God me help.

B Afterwards the Duke of York, and all the Nobility singly ascended the Throne, and touched the King's Crown, promising by that Ceremony to be ever ready to support it with all their power.

During the performing of this Solemn Ceremony, the Lord High Chancellour went to the South, West, and North-sides of the Stage, and proclaimed to the People the King's General Pardon, being attended by Mr. Garter to the South-side, and by a Gentleman-Usher, and two Heralds to the other two Sides.

And at these three Sides, at the same time, did the Lord Cornwallis, Treasurer of His Majesty's Household, Ring abroad the Medals, both of Gold, and Silver, prepared for the Coronation, as a Princely Donation, or Largess, among the People.

The King being thus enthronized, the Gentlemen of his Chappel began this following Anthem, C Behold, O Lord, our Defender, and look upon the Face of thine Anointed.

The Violins, and other Instrumental Musick, (who were robed in Scarlet Mantles, and placed in a Gallery erected over against them, on the North-side of the Altar) answering alternately: at the ending of which Anthem, the Trumpets sounded, and Drums beat again. In which time the Bishop of London went up to the High-Altar, and began the Communion; and immediately the King took off His Crown, and delivered it to the Lord High Chamberlain to hold; the Scepter with the Cross to Mr. Henry Howard, and that with the Dove to the Duke of Albemarle.

The Epistle (taken out of the First Epistle of St. Peter, the second Chapter, and beginning at the eleventh Verse) was read by the Bishop of Chichester.

D The Gospel (being part of the twenty second Chapter of St. Matthew, beginning at the fifteenth Verse) by the Bishop of Ely.

After which, the Nicene Creed was began by the Bishop of London, and sung by the Gentlemen of the Chappel, with Verse, and Chorus, (that, and the rest of the special Musick, for the Solemnity, being set by Caprain Cook, Master of the Children of his Majesty's said Chappel) The Violins, and other Instrumental Musick, placed in the Gallery over against them, alternately playing.

All which time the King stood by His Throne.

But towards the end of the Creed He took again his Crown from the Lord Great Chamberlain, and put it on his Head; as also the Scepter with the Cross from Mr. Howard, and that with the Dove from the Duke of Albemarle, and prepared for His Descent from his Throne towards the Altar, to receive the Communion.

E And, as soon as the singing of the Creed was fully ended, the King descended with the Crown on his Head, and Scepters in both Hands, (the Bishops of Durham, and Bath and Wells, supporting him) with the four Swords naked before, and all the great Officers attending.

In the time of this Proceeding, the Quire sung.

Let my Prayer come up into thy presence as the Incense, and the lifting up of my hand be as an Evening-Sacrifice.

Here the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury retired from the Ceremonies into St. Edward's Chappel, and thence went home, leaving the remainder of his Duty to be performed by the Bishop of London.

F At the King's approach to the Altar, the Bishop of Ely delivered unto Him Bread, and Wine, which He there offered, and then returned to the Fold-stool, on the South-side of the Altar, near His Chair of State, before which He knelt down, and laid His Crown upon the Cushion before Him, towards his right Hand; and the Scepter with the Dove, on his left; and gave again to Mr. Howard the Scepter with the Cross, who held it, kneeling on the King's right Hand: the Grand Officers, and the Noble men, with the four Swords naked, and erect, standing about Him.

Then the Bishop of London said this Prayer,

Bless, O Lord, we beseech thee, these thy Gifts, and sanctifie them unto This holy Use, &c.

G At the end of which, the Lord Cornwallis, Treasurer of the Household, presented the King with another Wedge of Gold, which goeth under the name of the Mark of Gold. This the King offered into the Basin, kneeling still at His Fold-stool, while the Bishop of London said the following Prayer, Almighty God, give Thee the dew of Heaven, and the farness of the Earth, and abundance of Corn, and Wine, &c.

Amen

And

1661.

And next pronounced this Blessing,

Bless, O Lord, the virtuous carriage of This KING, and accept the work of His Hands: replenish the Realm with the Blessings of Heaven, of the Dew, of the Water, and of the Dews.

Then the Bishop proceeded to the Consecration of the Sacrament: which being finished, he first of all received; next, the Dean of Westminster; then, the Bishop of Bath and Wells; and lastly, the Bishop of Durham.

These four Prelates having communicated, Preparation was made for the King's Receiving, who kneeled all this while before His Fold-stool.

The Towel was brought thither by Mr. Rumbal, on the behalf of the Master of the Ward-robe, and presented to the Bishops of Hereford, and Carlisle, who held it before the King, while He received.

The Bishop of London gave the King the Bread, and the Dean of Westminster the Cup.

As soon as the King had received, this Anthem was begun by the upper Choir,

O harken unto the voice of my Calling, my Kings, and my God, &c.

In the mean while, the King returned to His Throne upon the Theatre, with the Crown on His Head, and bearing the Scepters in his Hands.

When He came thither, He put off His Crown, and delivered it to the Lord Great Chamberlain, the Scepter with the Cross to Mr. Howard, and that other with the Dove to the Duke of Albemarle.

And then the Bishop of London went on with the Communion, which being finished, the King (attended as before) descended from his Throne crowned, with both the Scepters in His Hand.

The rest of the Regalia (which lay all this while on the Altar, being delivered to the Noblemen, that brought them in the Proceeding to the Church) were carried before Him, and thence the King proceeded into St. Edward's Chappel, the Organs playing all the while.

Where being arrived, He took off St. Edward's Crown, and delivered it to the Bishop of London, who immediately laid it upon St. Edward's Altar; all the rest of the Regalia were given into the hands of the Dean of Westminster, and laid there also.

Afterwards the King entered into the Traverse erected in the middle of the Wall, on the back-side of the High Altar, and there retired, whilst He was disrobed of St. Edward's Robes by Mr. Seymour, and Mr. Alsburnham, Grooms of the Bed-Chamber, on the behalf of the Lord High-Chamberlain, Mr. Elliot, Mr. Progers, Colonel Philips, and Mr. Chiffinch assisting.

These Robes were laid on St. Edward's Altar by the Bishop of Durham; and afterwards delivered to the Dean of Westminster to lay up with the Regalia.

After this, the King was arrayed in His Purple Robes, and then came near to St. Edward's Altar, where the Bishop of London stood ready with the Imperial Crown in his hands, and set that upon the King's Head; thereupon the King took the Scepter with the Cross in His right Hand, with the Globe in His left; and immediately the Proceeding (ordered also by the Herald) began thence into Westminster-Hall, the same way that He came, and attended after the same manner, saving that the Noblemen, and Bishops, which brought the Regalia to the Abbey-Church, went not now immediately before the King, as they did then, but were ranked in places according to their Degrees, and Consecrations: all the Noble-men with their Coronets, and Caps on their Heads. The Kings of Arms marched likewise with their Crowns on.

The Proceeding being entered into Westminster-Hall, the Nobility, and others, who had Tables assigned them, went, and placed themselves thereat; but the King, (attended with the Great Officers) withdrew into the Inner-Court of Wards, for half an hour.

In the mean time, all the Tables in the Hall were served, viz. before the King's Service came up; and were placed in this manner:

On the right hand of the King's Throne, below in the Hall, were set two Tables, one beneath the other: at the upper end of the first next the Stairs, (which had two Side-Tables to serve it) sat the Bishops, and below them the Judges, with the rest of the Long-Robe.

At the second Table, (which had two Side-Board Tables likewise to serve it) sat the Masters of the Chancery, and the Six Clerks.

And here, at this Table, were the Barons of the Cinque-Ports necessitated to sit, although the upper end of the first Table was appointed for them.

The Occasion this: No sooner had the aforesaid Barons brought up the King to the foot of the Stairs in Westminster-Hall, ascending to His Throne, and turned on the left hand (towards their own Table) out of the way, but the King's Foot-men most insolently, and violently seized upon the Canopy, which the Barons endeavouring to keep, and defend, were by their number, and strength, drag'd down to the lower end of the Hall, nevertheless still keeping their hold: and, had not Mr. Owen YORK-Herald been accidentally near the Hall-Door, and seeing the Contest, caused the same to be shut, the Foot-men had certainly carried it away by force. But, in the interim also, (speedy notice hereof having been given the King) one of Querris were sent from Him, with Command, to imprison the Foot-men, and dismiss them out of His Service, which put an end to the present Disturbance.

These Foot-men were also commanded to make their submission to the Court of Claims, (which was

was accordingly done by them, the 30th of April following, and the Canopy then delivered back to the said Barons.

Whilst this Disturbance happened, the upper end of the aforesaid Table was taken up by the Bishops, Judges, &c. and hereupon it came to pass, that the Barons of the Cinque-Ports lost their Places, and were necessitated to sit down at the said second Table, with the Masters of Chancery, &c. where there was Room left by some of the Long-Robe, that sat at the Upper-Table.

Upon the left hand of the King's Throne, below, on the other side of the Hall, was placed likewise a long Table, which reached down near to the Common-Pleas-Court, whereat the Nobility dined; and this Table had four Side-Board-Tables to serve it.

And behind this, close to the Wall, at a shorter Table, sat the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, Recorder, and twelve chief Citizens of London, who had also two Side-Tables to serve them.

Lastly, within the Court of Common-Pleas was a Table with one Side-Table to serve it, set for the Officers of Arms, whereat they also dined. Each Table was furnished with three Courses answerable to that of the King's, besides the Banquet.

A little before the King returned to Dinner, two Esquires of the Body, viz. Ferdinando Marsham, and Henry Norwood, took their Seats upon two little Foot-stools, on either side of the foot of the King's Chair, (placed in the middle of the Table) and there sat until the King came in to Dinner; when rising, and performing their Duty in placing the King's Robes for His better convenience of sitting, they sat down again at the King's Feet a good part of Dinner time, and until the King gave them leave to rise; He accepting that time of Session in full performance of their Service.

On the right Side of the Throne was erected a Gallery for the Kings of Arms, Heralds, and Pursuivants; and opposite to that, on the other side, another for the Musick: and below, on the old Scaffolds, next the Court of Common-Pleas, stood the King's Trumpeters.

who carried up the Service, two and two to a Dish, which was set upon the Table by the Earl of Lincoln Carver, assisted by the Earl-Sewers.

In the Rear came up three Clerks of the Kitchen, viz. Mr. Leonard Pinkney, Mr. John Clements, and Mr. Henry Firi-balls, all suted in Black, Fugar'd Satin Gowns, and Velvet Caps, in fashion like those worn by the Clerks Comptrollers.

Dinner being set on the Table, the King came forth from the Inner-Court of Wards, in His Royal Robes, with the Crown on His Head, and Scepter in his Hand, having the three Swords born naked before Him, and went directly to his Chair at the Table, wherein He sat down to Dinner, the Bishop of London saying Grace. The Baron and Ewer were brought up and presented by the Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, assisted by the Lord Paget, and the Sergeant of the Ewer.

On the King's right Hand, the Noble-men, that carried the three Swords, stood, holding them naked, and erected, all the Dinner-while; at His left Hand stood the Lord High Chamberlain, to whom the King had given the Scepter to hold: And at the Table's end, on the King's left Hand, sat the Duke of York in his Robes and Coronet.

Soon after Dinner was begun, the Lord Alington carried to the King His first Draught of Drink in a Silver Gilt Cup, being assisted by the Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, Viscount Montague, and the Lord Paget, his Assistants.

as being seized of the Mannor of Wymundley in the County of Hertford; and when the King A had drank, the said Lord Allington received the Cup for his Fee.

Next, Thomas Leigh Esquire was brought up to the Table with a Mess of Potage, called Dill-grant, this Service being adjudged unto him by the aforesaid Court of Claims, in right of the Mannor of Addington in the County of Surrey; whereupon the Lord High Chamberlain presented him to the King, who accepted the Service, but did not eat thereof.

Afterwards, a little before the second Course was ready, Sir Edward Dymock (to whom the Court of Claims had adjudged the Office of the King's Champion, as being seized of the Mannor of Serivelby, in the County of Lincoln) entered the Hall on a goodly White Courser, and armed at all Points in Rich Armour, having a Plume of Blew Feathers in his Helm; he there made a stand for some time, and then advanced in manner following, way being made for him by the Knight-Marshal.

First, Two Trumpets.

The Serjeant-Drum.

The Serjeant at Arms.

An Esquire carrying a Target, having the Champion's own Arms depicted thereon.

An Esquire, carrying the Champion's Lance upright.

The Champion.

The Lord High-Constable on his right Hand.

Both likewise on Horse-back.

At the lower end of the Hall, YORK-Herald proclaimed the Challenge, in these words following,

The Form of the Challenge however omitted in Mr. Ashe-mole's Original, being in all the rest more complete and correct, we have supply'd out of the other Narrative which was since done and extracted out of his.

IF any Person of what degree soever, high or low, shall deny, or gain-say Our Sovereign Lord King CHARLES the Second, King of England, Scotland, France, D and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, Son and next Heir to Our Sovereign Lord CHARLES the First, the last King deceased, to be right Heir to the Imperial Crown of this Realm of England; or that He ought not to enjoy the same: here is His Champion, who saith, That he lyeth, and is a false Traytor, being ready in Person to Combate with him, and in this Quarrel will adventure his Life against him, on what day soever he shall be appointed.

Thereupon the Champion threw down his Gauntlet, which lying some small time, and no body taking it up, it was delivered unto him again by YORK-Herald. Then all advanced forward, until the Champion came to the middle of the Hall, where YORK-Herald made the like Proclamation, and the Gauntlet was again thrown down, taken up, and returned to the Champion, who advanced to the foot of the ascending Steps to the State, and at the top of the said Steps, the said Herald proclaimed the said Challenge the third time, whereupon the Champion threw down his Gauntlet again, which no body taking up, it was delivered unto him.

This being done, the Earl of Penbroke and Montgomery (assisted, as before) presented on the Knee to the King a Gilt Cup with a Cover, full of Wine, who drank to His Champion, and by the said Earl sent him the Cup; and he, after three Reverences, drank it all off, went a little backward, and so departed out of the Hall; taking the said Cup for his Fee, according as had been adjudged him by the said Court of Claims.

When this Solemnity was finished, the Kings, Heralds, and Pursuivants descended from their Gallery, and went into the Hall to the lower end of the Noble-mens Table, and there all together made their Reverence. Thence they proceeded a little further, and there made a second Reverence; and the like Reverence at the Steps ascending to the State. Where all standing still, Garret, Principal King of Arms, cryed Largess thrice, and proclaimed the King's Style in Latin, French, and English, making Reverence betwixt every Style. At the finishing of which, they all retired backward into the midst of the Hall, and there, after crying Largess again thrice, he proclaimed the King's Style as before. Lastly, they went yet backwards to the end of the said Noble-mens Table, and did the same again; and from thence into the Common-Pleas-Court, to Dinner.

Immediately after this, the second Course was brought up by the Gentlemen-Pursoners, with the former Solemnity.

And the last Dish being carried by Erasmus Smith Esquire, he, having delivered the same to the Table, presented the King with three Maple Cups, on the behalf of Robert Barnham Esquire, who was seized of the Mannor of Nether-Bilfington in the County of Kent.

Lastly, the Lord Mayor of London presented the King with Wine in a Golden Cup having a Cover; of which the King having drank, the said Lord Mayor received it for his Fee.

By

A By this time the day being far spent, the King (having Water brought Him by the Earl of Penbroke, and his Assistants) washed, and rose from Dinner before the third Course was brought in; and, retiring into the Inner-Court of Wards, He there disturbed Himself: and from thence He went privately to His Barge, which waited for Him at the Parliament-Stairs, and so to the Privy-Stairs at White-Hall, where He landed.

It is a thing very memorable, that, towards the end of Dinner-time, (although all the former part of the day, and also the preceding day, in which the King made His Cavalcade through London, were the only fair days, that we enjoyed of many both before, and after) it began to Thunder and Lighten very smartly: which, however some sort of People were apt to interpret as ominous, and ill-boding, yet it will be no difficult matter to evidence from Antiquity, that Accidents of this nature, though happily they might astonish, and amaze the common Drove of men, were by the most Prudent, and Sagacious, look'd upon as a prosperous, and happy presage. And of this, Virgil gives us a very pertinent Example (in the Eighth Book of his Æneids) where Evander, having addressed himself in a Speech to Æneas for aid against the Æturiens, and He being solicitous how to answer his request, mark what Sign was immediately sent from Heaven,

For suddenly from Heav'n a brandish'd Flash
With Thunder came, &c.

C And presently after the Poet adds,

Agnovit sonitum, & Diva promissa Parentis.*

While others stood amaz'd, the Hero knew
His Mother's Promise by the Sound that flew.

The same Author, in another place*, mentions the same thing, as a Testimony of Prayers D heard, and answered; as when Old Anchises, seeing the lambent Flame upon his Grand-child Iulus his Head, lifted up his hands to Heaven, and prayed to Jove for help, and direction, he was thus answered,

Vix ea satis erat senior, subitoque fragore Insonuit lævum, &c.

Scarce had the grave Sire spoke, when suddenly
It thundered prosperous, &c.

E For so Insonuit lævum is interpreted by Servius, according to the Maxim of the Antient Augurs, who interpret Thunder from the North, that is, (as they, contrary to the common Astrologers, accounted it) the left part of Heaven, for a prosperous Omen.

But, in reference to our present Purpose, we may proceed to a larger Interpretation, and conclude, That the Heavens, with the Volleys of Thunder, and nimble Flashes of Lightning, seemed to give a Plaudite, and Acclamation, to this Grand and Sacred Solemnity; in like manner as we Mortals use to close our greater Triumphs with Fire-Works, Bonfires, and the loud Report of our great Ordinance: this Terrestrial Thunder being but the Imitator, and Counterfeit of the Heavenly Artillery.

And so I observe it expounded by Claudian in these Verses †,

Aptare togas, Signum dat summus hiulca
Nube Pater, gratamque facem per inane rotantes Prospera vibrati sonnerunt Omnia Nimbi.*

As soon as rob'd, and scepter'd, Jove aloud
His Signal Favour thunders from a Cloud, Successful Lightning through Heav'n's Arches shines;
Both at His Coronation happy Signs.

G Thus having travail'd through a HISTORY fraught with Troubles and Confusions, an Unnatural and Ineffable War succeeded by a long time of Usurpation and Mis-rule; and now having at length arriv'd to such a point of Settlement and Right restor'd, as promises a long continued Calm and Peaceful Government, We glad to have found such a Convenient Haven, shall here choose to cast our Anchor; And though several Things have hapned from the Coronation to this present time (as the King's Marriage with the Daughter of Portugal, the Transactions of the present present Parliament, with other matters sufficiently Memorable; yet in regard we cannot Close at a more happy Period, We shall reserve as well something of what is past, as what is yet to come, for a farther Continuation, as likewise the observation of that Method, which our Historians ever observes at the end of every King's Reign, no other Period so handfomely admitting of the said Method. And if the last Part of our HISTORY somewhat exceed in Bulk what may be thought proportionable to the rest, It will no doubt be in a great measure excus'd by the Consideration of what manner of Times we have had to set forth, an Interval of such Wonders, such strange and Capricious Revolutions as are scarce to be parallell'd by any Age or Kingdom, hoping that the Intricate Turns and Labyrinths of Fortune being now at length run out, the Course and Stream of the History will run more smooth and clear through all the subsequent Years (which God grant may be many and Prosperous) of His present Majesty's Reign; Than whom, never was any Prince likely to prove a more glorious President to those that after him shall Sit at the Helm of State, both in respect of His Innumerable other Vertues and Regall Endowments, and particularly of His Admirable Skill and Understanding in that which is the Bulwark of the Nation; the Improvement whereof so mainly Imports His own Glory and Renown above all other Princes of the World, and the Reputation and Enrichment of His Subjects; a thing wherein He hath ever shew'd Himself to be most Zealously Concern'd.
